Spending Probe rocks Athletic Dept.

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

For the last eight months, a scandal has rocked the University of Massachusetts athletic department, shaking the very foundation of the athletic department if not the University itself.

What began as a controversy over the resignation of the school's head football coach has exploded into a ongoing investigation by the House of Representatives.

Longtime Athletic Director Frank McInerney and former Dean of Physical Education David Bischoff left their jobs in the middle of the turmoil, McInerney on May 4 and Bischoff on July 3.

Bischoff resigned after less than two months at his newly appointed posts, which were director of the Mullins Center and associate chancellor. Bischoff's new titles were announced on May 4.

This has led to, among other things, the revelation

New University president aims for faculty raises

Hooker looks to rebuild Massachusetts' public higher education system

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

Michael K. Hooker was chosen by the Board of Trustees in May as the new president of the five-campus University of Massachusetts system.

Hooker, whose base salary is the highest among all state public employees, said boosting salaries of the University faculty, who have not received pay raises in four years, as well as building support in the state for restoring the budget are topping his list of priorities.

"The ability to do anything depends on a strong staff," Hooker said 12 hours into his post during an interview last week at the Campus Appreciation celebration.

"It's important for the university to demonstrate to the government and legislation that the reorganization of the five-college system was a good idea," said Hooker, who was currently president of the University of Maryland, Baltimore County.

Hooker, 46, is an educational administrator and philosopher who received his Ph.D. from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst in 1973.

"We have to demonstrate that we are able to do things as a collective of campuses and not alone," said Hooker. "We can rebuild the state's economy collectively rather than individually, focusing on economically developing an educated workforce for the 21 century."

Last year, the Massachusetts legislature united campuses in Amherst, Boston, Dartmouth, Lowell and Worcester into a new University system with increased independence and fiscal autonomy. This new five-college system will be governed by a single Board of Trustees and the new President.

Picked following a six-month national search, Hooker, has been the president of the University of Maryland Baltimore County since 1986.

He succeeds E.K. Fretwell, who was appointed on an interim basis in July 1991 to lead the University following the President's benefits are questioned

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

Since one of Michael Hooker's top goals is to raise faculty salaries, he is setting a good example by being on the receiving end of one of the highest state salaries and a posh but temporary address at the most luxurious condominium development in Cambridge.

Many University of Massachusetts faculty and staff are supportive of the incoming president's $175,000 a year paycheck - the highest base salary among all state public employees.

This is 35 percent more than the previous president's salary.

"The most important item on my agenda, before which all others pale, is salary increases," said Hooker at an education conference over the summer.

Gordon Oakes, chairman of the Board of Trustees, said the search committee began seeking a candidate in the national marketplace and compared salaries across the country to determine a competitive salary.

"We want UMass to be the best in the nation. That starts with the president. We have to be competitive to attract qualified candidates," said Oakes.

This salary also covers the cost of his rental unit at The Esplanade for $2,800 a month. The previous president, Joseph Duffey, received about $130,000 a year plus benefits.

Until a house is donated, Hooker expects to live in the apartment for no longer than one year. He said his Real Estate agent showed him apartments priced as high as $5,000 a month.

Nobel winner Tutu to visit UMass

By TAMI MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

Bishop Desmond Tutu, Nobel Peace Prize winner and anti-apartheid activist, will speak on Oct. 6 at 4 p.m. in the concert hall of the Fine Arts Center at the University of Massachusetts.

Tutu's visit is the result of efforts by the Episcopal Chaplaincy at the University, which has been working since 1985 to reach out to other parts of the world and specifically to raise money and awareness for South Africa.

"We wanted something big to bring attention to the issues in South Africa," said Chris Carlisle, the Episcopal chaplain at UMass.

Tutu was awarded the Nobel Prize for Peace for his efforts in nonviolent protests against apartheid in October of 1984.

He was born in Klerksdrop, South Africa on October 7, 1931 and was ordained an Anglican priest in 1961.

In November of 1984 he was elected the first black Anglican bishop of Johannesburg and he currently serves as archbishop of Cape Town.

Mzamo Mangaliso, an assistant professor in the School of Management and deputy vice chancellor of the University of Fort Hare in South Africa where Tutu is a council member, was instrumental in getting Tutu to campus.

The University of Fort Hare is the alma mater of Mangaliso, which he attended while Tutu was lecturing at the Federal Theological Seminary.

"Perhaps with faculty we can create a relationship with Fort Hare," said Carlisle. Mangaliso added that he is working on building an exchange program with Fort Hare which would encompass both students and faculty.

"When we look at South Africa we are looking at the mirror of America," Mangaliso said.

Both Mangaliso and Carlisle said they hoped that Tutu would bring a healing message to UMass which has had a history of racial tensions including the riots which took place in the Southwest Residence Area after the 1986 World Series.

"[Tutu's] had a way of avoiding political factionalism, which can be divisive," Carlisle said, adding that Tutu promotes unity in the midst of division.

"He calls himself a prisoner of hope," said Carlisle.

This will be Tutu's first stop in the United States since recent incidents of bloodshed in South Africa.

"One can anticipate him speaking on the incidents of Black on Black violence in the news recently," Mangaliso said.

Mangaliso anticipates Tutu speaking on the prospects of getting past the current deadlock in South African negotiations.

All donations associated with this project will go to the Desmond Tutu Scholarship Fund which funds the education of Black South Africans in the United States and Britain.

Tutu has also published two collections

AC buys atomic proof bunker

By Associated Press and Collegian Staff Reports

AMHERST — Amherst College could become the nation's only private, liberal arts school with its own three-story, atomic bomb-proof, Cold War bunker, complete with glassed-in command theater.

Brian Donovan, a spokesman for the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, said that the college was the high bidder for the massive underground hideaway tucked into a mountain pass between South Hadley and Amherst by the Strategic Air Command in the 1950s.

The bunker, with three-foot thick blast doors, was completed shortly before the Cuban missile crisis when nearby Westover Air Force Base was SAC's northeastern headquarters. The bank acquired it from the federal government when SAC pulled out of Westover in 1973.

For the past two decades, the Fed has used the 44,000 square-foot, climate-controlled bunker, originally designed to allow about 300 SAC generals and staff to hold out while directing retaliatory strikes, for storage and as a back-up location from which it could operate in case of natural and other disasters.

The only traces of its former use left behind by the Air Force in the cavernous command theater are yellowed projector screens, a red warning light labelled "A-1" and the lettering on the doors leading to the generals balcony reading "Senior Battle Staff Only."

Donovan said relaxation of federal regulations requiring the bank to maintain an atomic bomb proof storage area and the departure of its prime tenant, the New York Federal Reserve Bank, led it to put the bunker on the market last month.

Terry Allen, a college spokeswoman, said Amherst College plans to use the bunker for storage for "educational materials."

Allen said the college's offer was dependent on an engineering review and approval by the town Zoning Board of Appeals of the college's proposed uses. The 26-acre property is currently zoned residential.

She declined to reveal how much the college had offered the bank and Donovan would only say bids by "all the serious candidates" were over the $225,000 asking price.

Feds pull funding for program

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

Campus officials are appealing a decision by the U.S. Department of Education to eliminate federal funding for the University's Upward Bound program which assists disadvantaged students.

The Department of Education has previously picked up the tab for about $241,000 of the cost of the program - a year-long program that provides academic support for students from low-income families.

The University had paid for the remaining $85,000. This summer, the University ran a scaled-down version of the program, serving almost 60 kids.

"The University's first priority is to fight to get the federal funding back," said Chancellor Richard O'Brien in a June meeting with program staffers and supporters.

For the past 25 years, Upward Bound brought poor inner-city and rural youth to the University of Massachusetts for a six-week summer program before their freshmen year to prepare them for college life.

In addition, the program provided tutoring and support to the students throughout the school year.

"I share your disappointment and outrage that this important program did not receive federal funding to continue this summer," said O'Brien.

"Upward Bound has been an important expression of the University's commitment to encouraging the youth of Western Massachusetts to persevere through high school and pursue higher education," said O'Brien in a prepared statement last month.

Jo-Anne Vanin, interim vice chancellor for student affairs, is exploring ways of continuing a modified version of the program in the wake of the withdrawal of federal funding.

"At this point, Upward Bound is over," said Vanin. "We're tyring to come up with some strategies" to continue to serve the needs of disadvantaged college-bound students.

Vanin expressed disappointment over the University's rejected appeal to bring back federal funding to the program.

"Upward Bound has been a hallmark of things the University has been doing," said Vanin. "It's a tragedy."

Ken Burnham, interim dean of academic support services, said his hopes slowly sank during the months between the appeal of the decision and the word from the Department of Education that federal funding would not be reinstated.

"I started to get really hopeful," said Burnham. "And then I became very upset.

"I'm not knowledgable of anyone who has won an appeal with the U.S. Department of Education."

Fits of fashion

That wonderfully satirical magazine, Spy, aimed its wit at academia and listed a University of Massachusetts course, "Fashion Retail Buying," among the "The 50 Stupidest Courses" from colleges across the country.

Memorial funds established for two students

Two scholarship funds have been established at UMass in memory of two students, Matthew Peterson of Framingham and Joseph Pirog of Arlington, who died in a house fire on North Pleasant Street on Feb. 17, 1991.

The endowments for both scholarships have been established with gifts from Estelle Shea, Peterson's mother, and Ann Pirog, Pirog's mother.

The financial aid office will choose a winner of the Peterson scholarship each year based on need and academic merit. The recipient will be a graduate of Framingham High School attending UMass who shows an interest in humanities or fine arts.

Earnings on the Pirog fund will be divided equally among the departments of animal science and chemistry. This scholarship will go to one student in each major based on financial need and merit.

See you at the Olympics

Attention boomerang enthusiasts: The country's top 100 boomerang throwers competed this summer at UMass in the 10th annual National Boomerang Championships.

Participants included top players from New England and the current world champion. There was even a public auction of boomerangs and boomerang paraphernalia.

"It's an esoteric sport that attracts unique individuals," said tournament organizer Larry Ruhf, of Belchertown. "Many people get interested in boomerang throwing because its magical, yet scientific."

A former UMass student and former world record holder in boomerang hang-time, his boomerang stayed in the sky for a whopping two-and-a-half minutes.

And I though my aerobie could really fly.

Southwest Dorm Update

John Adams, not John Quincy Adams, will be closed during this school year. Washington Tower is ready for action after being closed last year for installation of a sprinkler system and other renovations.

Depending on student enrollment, Kennedy will be closed later in the fall semester or by the spring semester for the same reason.

It's costing about $850,000 to install the sprinkler system and another half a million to replace doors, new carpets, painting and new furniture. Each of the towers houses about 550 students.

Wind stolen

UMass renewable energy researchers are wondering who stole their scientific equipment from a wind turbine site on Mt. Tom in mid-July.

"He knew what he was doing," laments Ian Baring-Gould, a mechancial engineering student and research assistant on the Mt. Tom project. He said the thief would have needed special tools and a prior knowledge of the research site.

"Perhaps he thought he was stealing from a major corporation, and not a university trying to research how to provide a renewable energy source for the Northeast," says Gould.

Since January, researchers have been collecting wind data to deterimine how to place the turbine. The theft of a photovoltaic panel and a wynch essentially fazed out the operation. Now, they will have to rely on older data.

The Mt. Tom turbine project is designed to discover greater uses of wind energy in the Northeast. If anyone has any information on the theft, call project director Bill Stein, 545-0684.

State bolsters University budget by $10 million

By TAMI MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

Chancellor Richard O'Brien had an interesting dilemma this summer — how to spend almost $10 million in additional state funding.

For the first time in four years, the University has received a budget increase of $9.8 million from state and tuition sources.

The largest allocation is $2.1 million to be spent on building repair and maintenance. The University cites a need for funding "to work on major capital improvements."

Student Trustee Kevin Newnan said the Fine Arts Center needs major repairs and that some University housing buildings including the Marshall Annex have been condemned. He called other campus buildings "dangerous."

This additional funding will go toward improving faulty steam lines and roof repairs and also restoring other buildings sorely in need of repairs.

In addition, $2 million, the second largest allocation, will be used to fund graduate student stipends and health fees. Stipends will be increased by $1,000 per graduate employee.

Last semester, the Graduate Employee Organization held a strike to fight for increased stipends and health fee waivers.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien met with Jennifer Wood, president of the Student Government Association and Mark Kennen, president of the Graduate Student Senate, to solicit their advice on how the additional funds should be spent.

Wood said she suggested a fee decrease but the administration favored restoring funding to campus programs.

"I would have liked to have seen more money come back to the students since we paid for the cuts," Wood said. "But this will still benefit students."

The budget includes an allocation of $302,000 to improve the financial aid office.

"Any money spent to make the financial aid office easier to deal with would benefit students," said Wood.

About 1.5 million will help offset a "larger than anticipated freshman class" which is creating a need for additional classes and academic programs.

The budget also allocates over $900,000 for teaching and research equipment and includes a $700,000 allocation for faculty replacements.

About a dozen new faculty are expected, including two paid under the Special Opportunity Fund, a funding method designed to attract more women and minorities to campus.

Some $600,000 has been marked for programs and activities aimed at retaining students, particularly minority students.

Newnan said the additional funding will boost morale.

"It's just a beginning. It doesn't rectify all the damage that has been done," said Newnan. He called it a step toward a solution.

"It's better to be in a quandary about how to spend extra money," said Newnan.

Additional monies will go to fund compliance with new laws, specifically the American Disabilities Act, and for economic development intitiatives.

Firm picked to manage Mullins

Arena set to open with February basketball game

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has picked an Illinois firm to run the new $51 million multipurpose arena scheduled to open next February when the men's basketball team takes on West Virginia.

Officials said a five-year contract calls for the University to pay a $151,200 annual management fee to Ogden Entertainment Services Corp.

Ogden will also receive 25 percent of the revenue after the basketball and hockey arena breaks even.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien said this management firm was chosen because of its previous success in running similar multipurpose arenas.

"Ogden's proposal and experience exhibited the sensitivity to working with universities that we were seeking as well as an aggressive approach to booking events into the arena," said O'Brien.

"For the University, this combination was essential," he said.

The 10,000-seat arena, which will cost $1 million a year to operate, will be used for theater productions, exhibitions, banquets and commencement in addition to sporting events.

Ashoke Ganguli, the director of auxilliary services, said the Mullins construction schedule is proceeding right on target.

"It's been a good summer because of the weather we've been having and everything is moving ahead," said Ganguli. "We look forward to a sellout game (in February)."

The arena's practice ice rink, racquetball courts and weight-training facilities will be used for physical education classes.

In addition, the arena will have two Olympic-size ice rinks, one of which can be turned into a basketball court.

Ogden will operate the food and beverage concession with its subcontractor, the University's Auxilliary Services.

A California firm, Facility Merchandising Inc., will manage the merchandise and novelty concession.

University officials had narrowed down the search for a management firm to Ogden and a Philadelphia firm, Spectacor Management Group.

"In the end, the selection committee believed that Ogden had more experience working with universities and, based on its proposal, would book more events," said Paul Page, vice chancellor of Administration and Finance.

Ogden manages more than 100 facilities throughout North America and Europe, including the Los Angeles Forum, the Meadowlands Convention Center in New Jersey and several campus arenas.

UMass celebrates 125th freshman class

By Collegian Staff Reports

COURTESY UNIVERSITY NEWS OFFICE

The first freshman class of the University of Massachusetts assembles for a picture outside of the North College building.

As the incoming University Class of 1996 makes its transition to college life, no doubt it will bemoan scheduling conflicts, 9 a.m. lectures and roomates who claim they study best with the stereo on full blast.

Perhaps the Class of 1996 can find solace in the tale of the Pioneer Class of 1871 at Massachusetts Agricultural College, as the University was named when it accepted its first students 125 years ago, in 1867.

Life was much less complex for the Pioneer Class than it is for the Class of 1996. The Pioneer Class didn't worry about high school transcripts, essays, or SAT scores.

Instead, prospective students just needed to pass an admissions exam, provide proof that they were at least 15 years old and furnish a certificate of good character from a teacher or minister.

When the school year began on Oct. 2, 1867, there were only about 30 men enrolled.

And there were only four buildings on campus. The Pioneer Class would be shocked to see its alma mater today, with about 130 buildings, ready to accept a freshman class of 3,800.

The Pioneer Class did not pore through a catalog listing 2,850 classes in more than 125 degree programs to balance their schedules and fulfill "gen. ed." requirements.

Back in 1867, all students had to take the same three classes each term.

And getting to know your professors? It was pretty easy since there were only four. Today, the University boasts over 1,200 faculty members.

All students in the Pioneer Class followed the same schedule. They woke up at 6:30 a.m., had breakfast and said prayers before attending their three classes and participated in gymnastics or mandatory military drill until lunch at 12:30 p.m.

Afternoons were free for study, except for two days each wee when the students were required to labor - without pay - on the school's farm.

Marching to the Amherst College chapel, the students went to Bible classes every Sunday. Despite this rigorous schedule, the Pioneer Class still found time for extracurricular activities.

The class formed two literary societies, a baseball team, a Christian Club, penned a column for The Amherst Record and began the Index Yearbook which is still published today.

In fact, they even formed secret societies - precursors to today's fraternities.

The Pioneer Class hadn't heard of basketball and certainly never had a team in the Sweet 16 but it had a crew team that obliterated the top Ivy League teams, including Harvard and Brown in 1871.

If the University is now credited with a high level of social activism, the Pioneer Class set the precedent. The Class of 1871 wet on strike twice, once refusing to march to the Amherst College Chapel on a 100-degree morning and a second time the class protested the compulsory labor system.

The Pioneer Class of 1871, having no history or tradition to guide it, forged its own path, often in the face of skepticism from state legislators who did not see the need for a public institution and though the state already had enough colleges.

"It has been a trying time for us," wrote the Pioneer Class at the end of its freshman year in August, 1868. "This class has bourne the heat and burden of the day, it has stood by in these dark hours, when it seemed to outsiders as though the institution would fail."

The class motto was "through trail to triumph." And triumph they did.

Some of the students proceeded to become state representatives and senators, college presidents, writers, lawyers and businessmen.

The Pioneer Class graduated 28 young men who, for four years, worked hard for their college. They spent their days in study, afternoons on the farm and their spare time making the muddy, undeveloped campus their home.

UMass a forerunner in solar energy research

By BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is working at the forefront of energy conservation by soon being home to the nation's first major project for using stored solar-generated heat for winter use.

The project, which is headed by mechanical engineering professor J. Edward Sunderland, will be the first central solar heating plant with seasonal storage in the country. Sunderland said the project is on schedule and should be completed by next January.

"The public is ready for this kind of technology," said Sunderland.

The new 10,000-seat Mullins Arena currently under construction will be heated by this ground-breaking new system. In addition, it will also heat the showers, pool and gym on the top floor of Boyden Gymnasium, which houses the University's sports studies program.

The project calls for the use of solar collectors similar to those found on rooftops for solar hot-water devices. The collectors will be located on the seven-acre open field between the wastewater treatment plant and Route 116. They will heat water that is pumped through plastic loops of pipe buried in a clay deposit 100 feet deep.

Sunderland said the system can store heat all summer and release 85 percent of it during the heating season.

The researchers are still seeking funding, but they hope a statement of approval and support from Congress will boost their efforts for securing funds for construction.

In fiscal year 1988, Congress provided $250,000 for site evaluation and preliminary design work for the project. An additional $400,000 was provided in fiscal year 1991 for the final engineering design.

The overall construction cost is estimated to be $4.8 million over two years.

"Money for this project is a pittance compared to the funds spent on fossil fuel and nuclear research programs," said senior research associate Dwayne Breger.

As part of the Energy and Water Development funding bill for fiscal year 1993, the statement from Congress "recognizes the significant contribution that the University of Massachusets is making to the overall mission of the Department of Energy's renewable energy program.

"DOE has supported this project through the final engineering and preconstruction phase... The Department should continue to provide assistance to this project that will demonstrate the viability of storing solar-generated heat underground for use on a year-round basis for the United States."

"With the statement approved by Congress, there will be pressure on DOE to include the University's work in its budget, with some state cost-sharing. It's just a matter of finding a funding mechanism," Breger said.

Breger estimated the system will save about 1 million pounds of coal per year burned at the campus central steam plant.

"The technology offers tremendous opportunities for avoiding environmental impacts of fossil fuel use," said Sunderland.

In a letter of support for the project, Massachusetts U.S. Sen. Edward Kennedy said, "It is crucial that we keep moving forward with this endeavor, which has great potential for reducing our national energy dependence.

"There are particularly important implications of this technology for the middle and northern tiers of the country, where heating for buildings constitutes a significant portion of overall energy demand."

New fire systems to reduce accidental alarms

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts fire officials installed over $600,000 in state-of-the-art fire alarm and sprinkler systems in campus buildings during the summer break.

Staff from the Physical Plant, Housing, and Environmental Health and Safety oversaw the installation of new computerized fire alarm systems in Emerson, James, Melville and Thoreau.

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Assistant Fire Chief Bowler assembles some of his new recruits for a training session in the Campus Center Parking Garage.

These systems will provide better protection for residents and will reduce the number of accidental alarms, according to David Beaudin, associate fire prevention officer.

In addition, workers installed a residential sprinkler system in John Adams Tower. Beaudin said the system is designed to detect a fire, sound the alarm and extinguish a fire before it gets out of control.

"Sprinklers have been used for over 100 years in commercial properties but these systems respond quicker to fires," says Beaudin.

"We're trying to improve fire protection and summer is when we can do it," said Beaudin. "The fire prevention technology is getting better so we try to take advantage of it."

Also, student volunteer firefighters have arrived a week before the regular move-in day to begin their training.

Fire prevention staff spent part of their summers testing fire alarms, sprinklers, and fire hydrants in and around campus buildings.

Beaudin said they found no major problems with any of the equipment.

Another major project for campus fire officials is to reduce the number of false fire alarms and malicious damage to fire protection systems.

There was a large increase last year in the number of malicious fire alarms. To combat this behavior, Housing Services offers a $500 reward for information leading to the conviction of false alarm perpetrators.

During fiscal year 1991, there were 118 false alarms at the University.

UMass professor finds overworked are underfulfilled

By BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Staff

A study by a University of Massachusetts professor confirms what many have long suspected: People are working more, but finding life less fulfilling.

The study, called "Psychosocial Development in Adulthood: A 22-Year Sequential Study," was conducted by psychology Professor Susan Krauss Whitbourne and three co-researchers, and was published in the August issue of the Journal of Personality and Social Psychology.

According to the study, "The trend [for adults aged 20 to mid-40s] over the past decade shows that while work is becoming more and more important to people, a sense of the personal meaning of life has been eroding."

The study began in 1966 at the University of Rochester when a group of students participated in a research study on personality. In 1977, Whitbourne did a second similar study of a new generation of students. In 1988, a third generation of students was surveyed.

In 1988, a follow-up was done of students who had participated in the 1966 and 1977 tests, enabling Whitbourne and her colleagues to compare the attitudes of people at various ages, and also to chart the changes that had taken place in the two older groups since their earlier tests.

Whitbourne and her co-researchers Michael Zuzchlag from Georgia Southern University, Lisa Elliot from the State University of New York at Geneseo, and Alan Waterman from Trenton State college in New Jersey, found a dramatic increase in "industry," a personality trait Whitbourne said translates to mean "an identification with the work ethic, or what I call the 'yuppie mentality.'"

Researchers said they also found a dramatic decrease in a category called "integrity vs. despair," a measurement of a person's satisfaction with life.

"We found people were working harder and longer hours, but were literally questioning life's worth," Whitbourne said.

"These were successful people," she said. "They weren't trying to make ends meet. Their jobs were impressive. But somehow something was missing from their lives.

"What is interesting to me is the way changes in social values penetrate personality. People are aware something is happening, but they don't know exactly why," she said.

When asked to explain the test results, Whitbourne compared the subjects' psyches to the Reagan era and Reaganism.

"The people we studied in general had good jobs and made good money, but they found life was not very fulfilling," she said.

"The erosion of values regarding social welfare and

How secure is your future in computing?

As today's veteran programmers are watching their jobs being outsourced to the far corners of the earth, you can't help but ask yourself, "is there a secure future in programming?"

In Decline and Fall of the American Programmer, Ed Yourdon demonstrates how U.S. software organizations can become world class shops if they exploit the key software technologies of the 1990's. Companies and programmers that master these new technologies can be sure of superior productivity and quality -- and those that don't won't be here when the 21st century starts.

New UMass students get some good advice

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian staff

Being a new student at the University of Massachusetts can present an overwhelming dilemma, similar to that of a duck peeping its head out of an eggshell for the first time, anxious to learn how to swim.

Laura Hancock, a resident assistant from Wheeler and a double major in Pre-Law and Social Thought and Political Economy, said she didn't expect to enjoy college as much as she did. Her first weeks at UMass proved more exciting than scary, and she found it important to "be yourself."

"You have to open up and talk — you can't just expect people to knock down your door," she added.

Participating in various campus activities and interacting with personalities from all over the world, Hancock said she experienced things she'd never seen before.

She said she couldn't believe how people expressed themselves so openly and carefree through the way they dressed and participated in school activities.

"And classes are a lot better than in high school," said Hancock.

Housing Director Joseph Zannini said he realizes how frightening college can be for freshmen and recommends getting involved in activities and organizations.

"It's an opportunity to get to know so many people and develop leadership, cognitive and people skills," said Zannini.

Zannini said many people at the University are dedicated to encouraging students to realizing all the resources available.

"But the student needs to make that first step in getting assistance," added Zannini.

Dev Gupta, a resident assistant from Gorman and a junior communications major, advises new students to maintain their emotional stability.

"Have a day of sanity to counter the days of insanity...like on the weekend," said Gupta. "Party all you like, but always take stock of your surrounding."

Gupta also advised listening to upperclassmen.

"Go to the observatory, try a class off campus, eat here...do that now," said Gupta.

Associate Director of Housing Services Anne Miller encourages being a leader and not a follower.

"When making a decision about what's cool and what's not cool, the urge to fit in is so tough — be who you are, be independent," said Miller.

Miller also advised new students on campus to take charge of their lives.

"It's wonderful to be starting off — everyone did. Don't be afraid to ask questions, be proud."

Orchard Hill/Central Area Coordinator Matthew Ouellett agrees that no question is a dumb question and recommends getting involved in activities and organizations.

"Pick something to get involved in. It's a crucial way to ease into the atmosphere," said Ouellett.

Before Hancock met her roommate, she said she just assumed it would work out well. She quickly realized how important it is to have good communication between roommates, making an effort to get to know each other and being patient. She noted that everyone has differences and that "not everyone is like you."

"It makes life easier if you try and understand each other," said Hancock.

As an RA, Hancock said she is responsible for introducing her floor to each other through different programs and games. She said not many have had a problem adjusting.

Hancock encourages roommates to determine each other's habits and reach agreements in the beginning to prevent problems. She said she has helped even the best of friends resolve conflicts over bedtime schedules, cleaning and borrowing things, and guests, among others.

"You have to talk about everything," said Hancock.

Hancock's first dorm experience was in an all-girls hall, where she enjoyed making genuine friends, and didn't worry about loud music and sharing a bathroom with men.

She recommends living in single-sex residence halls if you occasionally need space and quiet time. If you must constantly be surrounded by people, she recommends the co-ed dorms.

But no matter where you are, Hancock said students need to adjust to respecting others and get used to new community rules. She said there is a medium between having fun and giving others respect.

"You're not the only one who lives there," said Hancock, adding, "everyone has rights and deserves respect."

For safety reasons, which Hancock considers not terribly strict, she said there are obvious objects which are not allowed in the dorms, like pets, weapons, microwave ovens and alcohol, if you're a minor.

U.S. economy hard on graduates

Recession darkens outlook for future classes

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Recent downsizing in the financial, insurance and high-tech manufacturing sectors of the economy will cast a long shadow over job prospects of future University of Massachusetts graduating classes, said Joan Stoia, director of the University's Mather Career Center.

The career center recently surveyed nearly 2,000 UMass graduates from 1989 and 1990 to find out about their work experiences in a recession. The results showed the four-year-old recession affecting nearly every graduate, according to Stoia.

"The employment rates of our 1990 graduates signaled the fact that they too were being affected by the deep and persistent recession that already had hundreds of thousands of Massachusetts blue collar workers in its grip," Stoia said.

The results of the survey are summarized in a 68-page report titled "Where Do We Go From Here: The Labor Market Experience of Recent UMass Graduates.

According to the survey, two thirds of those responding from the class of 1990 were employed full time while 7.1 percent were working part-time. 31.5 percent of the respondents felt they were currently underemployed, according to the survey.

Stoia sees the trend continuing. Even if there is an economic the short spans between boom and bust in business cycles will, in all likelihood, build the same employment insecurity into the fortunes of white collar workers as their blue collar counterparts have been experiencing, Stoia said.

By field of study, graduates from Social and Behavioral Sciences (including majors in communication, economics, political science, psychlogy and sociology) reported the highest unemployment rate of 28.1 percent. Second in the survey was Humanities/Fine Arts which reported 20.1 percent unemployed.

Just slightly over 78 percent of 1989 graduates responding to the poll were employed either full or part-time, and only 51.2 percent claimed they were employed in the fields in which prepared for.

Three industry groups accounted for nearly a third of the jobs for members of the class of 1990, according to the survey. Business services accounted for 12 percent, retail trade 7.8 percent, and finance, insurance and real estate 7.4 percent.

Stoia says for years, parents and universities have accepted high unemployment rates for new graduates as something which will correct itself and which they can do very little about. "But these assumptions are already being challenged," Stoia said.

"Active intervention by parents, advisors and University officials in support of career planning and placement for students in activities that foster career development can make a difference in the kinds of jobs students get after graduation," she says.

Nearly 75 percent of the respondents from the class of 990 obtained some type of formal work experience before graduation, such as co-op jobs, internships, and summer jobs, according to the survey. Nearly 90 percent felt their experiences had a positive effect on their job search.

College grads seeking jobs have it tough

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

As graduates are forced to find work in an increasingly tight job market, organization, persistence and focus are becoming important traits for the job seeker, according to Neil Yeager, a career development and organizational specialist based in the Division of Continuing Education at the University of Massachusetts.

"You have to show employers what value you will add to their organization," Yeager said. "Employers are looking for people who can come in and make a contribution immediately. They won't hire you just because you seem like a nice person with good energy and potential."

Yeager says the first steps in the job search are often the hardest. Setting reasonable targets when starting a job search, such sending out a few resumes a day, can prove to be helpful. Even simply setting aside a space in the house where a job-seeker can work on the search can make a difference.

According to Yeager, the job search can take 40 to 50 hours a week and it would prove beneficial to job seekers to set up a system to devote regular time to the task. Prospective employees should spend time researching companies, networking, sending out resumes and following up on interviews.

The current job market is the toughest and most selective Yeager has ever seen. A lack of jobs has pushed higher qualified applicants down an income level.

"People who had mid-level salary jobs are willing to take jobs at far lower salaries because that is all they can find," Yeager said. "So they are competing with other groups, including new college graduates, who they normally would not be competing with."

Keeping active and motivated are keys to the job search, said Yeager, who has been doing career development for 12 years. Despite the natural inclination to give up during tough times, becoming inactive in the job search is the surest way to stay unemployed.

UM scientist films documentary

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

As tons of plastic trash and medical waste continue to wash on New England's shorelines, a polymer scientist at the University of Massachusetts has produced a film documenting this worldwide dilemma.

Entitled "Troubled Waters," the film is a half-hour television documentary which was broadcast this summer on a local public television station. Almost half of the nation's 120 PBS stations have broadcast the documentary or plan to do so.

"It's a troubling story with a positive slant about the mounting problems associated with plastic waste being dumped in the ocean," said Richard Stein, director of the Polymer Research Institute at the University.

Stein says the United States produces over 60 billion pounds of plastic a year — more than ten pounds of plastic for every person on earth. "We're trying to get people to ask where it all goes," said Stein.

Stein is also starting to distribute the video cassette to schools and libraries throughout the country.

"It became clear to us that the solution to plastic waste disposal begins with an enlightened public," said Stein.

Ernest Urvater, the film's co-producer and an independent television producer in Natick, said their cameras captured some upsetting scenes.

"'Troubled Waters' contains some disturbing images," Urvator warns. "The footage of the Aleutian Island seal pups entangled in plastic fishing gear, and whales beaching themselves after ingesting plastic material is very powerful."

Almost $92,000 in funding was obtained from government, industry and private organizations to produce the documentary.

But the film doesn't just lament about the scope of the problem of plastic trash damaging marine environments.

"Troubled Waters" reveals government officials searching for plastic pellets "the size of match heads" and a Cub Scout troop cleaning up a waste along the normally pristine Hampton Beach shoreline.

"Ten percent of the time we convince you there's a problem," said Urvator. "And the rest of the time we show you what's being done." The film promises to be the first in a multi-part waste disposal documentary concentrating on methods of recycling and disposing of plastic.

Crime statistics released

New law shows campus crime to public

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

BOSTON — "Serious things can and do happen on a college campus," said Joe Griffin, Northeastern University police chief and president of the International Association of Campus Law Enforcement Administrators.

There were 2,636 reported incidents of crime at Massachusetts universities and colleges in 1989 — one every two hours while school was in session — according to figures released for the first time Tuesday under a new federal disclosure law.

"Rape is rape," said Sage Freechild, program coordinator of the Counselor-Advocate Program Against Violence Against Women at the UMass-Amherst campus, which accounted for 18 of the 65 reported rapes on campuses last year.

"Those statistics are pretty low, considering how many students there are in this state," Freechild said.

Among them: 65 rapes, 344 aggravated assaults, 1,236 burglaries and 437 car thefts. There were 259 arrests on Massachusetts campuses for violations of liquor laws, 143 for illegal drug activity and 88 for weapons possessions.

"Part of their sales pitch was, 'Come to this idyllic, safe-appearing campus,'" said Dorothy Siegel, director of the national Campus Violence Prevention Center at Towson State University in Maryland. "They were not recognizing that, gradually, crime was creeping in."

As of Tuesday, federal law requires campus crime statistics to be made available to students, faculty, staff and prospective students and their parents. Every school must publish and distribute a description of security procedures and statistics for the previous three years, or risk losing eligibility for federal funding.

Those documents are being handed out to students on most campuses this week.

"Burying your head in the sand just doesn't cut it anymore," said Dick O'Connor, director of security at Bunker Hill Community College.

The statistics may not reflect the total incidence of crime, since students - like most people - hesitate to report being the victim of a crime. And many incidents on campus are reported to municipal officials, not to the university's security department.

Confusion about the federal requirements also skewed the figures. Some colleges provided information from calendar year 1991, others for the federal fiscal year 1992, for instance.

There were no crimes of any reported by Massachusetts Bay Community College in Wellesley. But the school's police log shows that there were 51 complaints of thefts, 19 cases of breaking and entering into cars and three reports of harassment. Official said none of those crimes fell into the required categories.

"There are a few bugs to work out, but the idea of informing the public we think can only help," said Michael Callahan, security director at Bentley College in Waltham and president of the Massachusetts Association of College and University Public Safety Directors.

Arson is not required to be reported. But there were 22 cases of it last year at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst along with 25 of forgery, 424 of vandalism, 11 of fraud and 655 of larceny.

Fitchburg State College and Springfield College both reported no rapes, but in footnotes, acknowledged five "date rapes" between them.

"Most all crimes are under-reported, just as everywhere else," said Jim Granger, chief of security at Worcester State College.

"We're probably getting 25 to 40 percent of all crimes reported to us," he said.

Clare Cotton, executive director of the Association of Independent Colleges and Universities of Massachusetts, said, "In the end, the only person who can make you safe is yourself."

Officials: court ruling may skew financial aid

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

BOSTON — College and university officials say a court decision barring them from sharing information on financial aid could lead to bidding wars for top students and a decrease in aid for everybody else.

"It ultimately results in less money available in the student financial aid pool," said Sheldon Elliot Steinbach, vice president and general counsel for the American Council on Education.

"What happens is you wind up with people bidding for given students and that reduces the total amount of money in the pool."

A federal judge ruled Wednesday that the Massachusetts Institute of Technology violated antitrust laws by sharing financial aid information with the Ivy League colleges. The group of schools met to determine how much aid to offer certain students.

Judge Louis C. Bechtle's order bars MIT from "any combination or conspiracy" with any other college on grants to any student.

Princeton University spokesman Bob Durkee said the practice of collaborating on financial aid "tended to correct for errors on both sides. The net result was not to alter in any significant way the amount of aid. What it did was move some financial aid from some students to other students."

Now, he said, "there undoubtedly will be students who will receive larger awards than they have in the past. There also might be students who will receive smaller awards. You're talking about very able students who are not going to be able to afford to attend."

That argument, pivotal to MIT's case, was rejected by the judge.

Bechtle said his ruling "will only portend the end of need-blind admissions and schools' ability to guarantee the full need of their aid applicants if the schools decide that other financial

AUTOMATED ATTENDANT INSTALLATION AT USE

The University Health Services is in the process of installing an automated switchboard. When you call UHS at 549-2671, you will hear a recorded greeting and menu of the various services, clinics and offices.

A Touch-Tone phone will allow you to access the menu choices by pressing the numbers on the keyboard as you listen. If you know the extension number, you can press it anytime after the recorded greeting has begun and have your call routed immediately to that extension. To speak to the UHS Operator, press "0" at any time or wait until the end of the message when an operator will come on the line to assist you.

Because of the extremely high number of calls coming in to UHS, you may have experienced difficulty or frustration in trying to reach us in the past. The automated attendant will help to process your calls more quickly and efficiently.

Grant to help agricultural research

By Collegian Staff

A U.S. House-Senate conference committee has approved a $261,000 grant for the Massachusetts Center for Agricultural Management Systems Research at the University of Massachusetts as part of the fiscal 1993 funding bill for the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

The measure still needs the approval of both chambers of Congress and President Bush.

Without continued federal funding, according to research specialist William Coli, the center will have to "reduce a large number of studies, cutting-edge research, on the next generation of pest control strategies."

In the past two fiscal years, the center has received grants totaling $522,000. The funds were initially secured through the efforts of the late Congressman Silvio Conte.

Massachusetts Senator Edward Kennedy supported the grant. "The UMass/Amherst program is making an enormous contribution in exploring opportunities for safe alternatives to pesticides," said Kennedy. "I'm pleased that we have been able to sustain funding for this work that is so important in terms of environmental protection, food safety and economic benefits to farmers across Massachusetts."

The center has been carrying out large-scale research and education programs since the late 1970s, and is recognized as a leader in developing reduced-pesticide farming techniques and other strategies sometimes collectively referred to as "sustainable agriculture."

By replacing traditional pest control practices with integrated pest management (IPM) techniques, the center's programs have succeeded in reducing pesticide use by cooperating Mass. growers by 25 to 60 percent.

For example, center staff have shown that the bacterium Bacillus thuringensis is an effective and economical non-toxic alternative to insecticides for controlling the voracious Colorado Potato Beetle. Potato growers in Massachusetts have quickly adopted this new technology, and over 35 percent of the potato acreage in the state is now using this environmentally sound alternative.

In 1991, center staff demonstrated a 25 percent reduction in pesticide use on strawberry fields of participating growers with no adverse impact on yield.

Coli says IPM research is time consuming, labor intensive, and expensive. "It takes three to five years and tens of thousands of dollars to develop a non-pesticidal, ecological based strategy to control just one pest," says Coli.

priorities occupy a higher investment and financial plane" than scholarships.

The so-called Overlap Group effectively disbanded in 1989 when the Justice Department began its antitrust investigation. Only MIT fought the case; the others settled out of court, agreeing not to cooperate on financial aid awards for 10 years.

The 1,500-college American Council on Education was one of 16 organizations that filed briefs in the MIT case supporting the collaboration.

The decision, Steinbach said, "is likely to have dramatic consequences.

"Currently and perhaps for the future of these institutions, you will find a decreasing number of middle class students. They will go to their state university because they're priced out by being excluded from financial aid programs."

The new federal Higher Education Reauthorization Act, passed since the suit began, allows groups of colleges to agree on general policies and principles for handing out financial aid as long as they do not discuss specific applicants.

"This decision will have very limited practical effect," John Shattuck, vice president for government, community and public affairs at Harvard University, said of Bechtle's ruling.

He said that if universities agree to award financial aid based only on need, "it limits the possibilities" of scholarship wars to lure top scholars.

departure of President Joseph Duffy.

Hooker said he was also "intensely interested" in the problem of cracking the cycle of poverty and the disparity between the educated wealthy and the uneducated unskilled poor.

"There is nothing I feel more passionately about," said Hooker. "This is the greatest economic and moral challenge this country faces. We simply can't afford to have a disadvantaged, underskilled, undereducated poor class — it effects economic competitiveness.

"But the moral argument is greater," continued Hooker. "It makes no sense to have eight or 10 percent of the population going to bed hungry."

Hooker gives equal importance to acquiring a strong liberal arts education in addition to gaining scientific knowledge.

"How do you educate people to live meaningful and productive lives in the 21 century? How do you educate people and give people intellectual wherewithal to deal with a rapidly changing world?" questioned Hooker.

Hooker is inspired by the degree of commitment and morale of University employees.

"People could easily go. I'm humbled that [the staff] doesn't abandon the University and I will do everything in my power to reward loyalty with budget increases," said Hooker.

Hooker's a unanimous choice

Gordon Oakes, chairman of the Board of Trustees, said the appointment of Hooker was a unanimous decision.

"He is an outstanding individual whom (the trustees) feel quite fortunate to be able to recruit," said Oakes. "For the longterm good of the University we couldn't have a more outstanding president," said Oakes.

The 22-person search committee, which recommended Hooker as the only candidate for the trustees' consideration in May, included several trustees, faculty representatives and a number of public figures.

"We couldn't have found anyone better with such an outstanding record," said Oakes. "He has our complete support."

"It's a remarkable thing that we would get a president with a doctoral degree from this school," said David Lenson, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors and a comparitive literature professor.

An "inspirational character"

Lenson is pleased that the University has enough confidence in its own training and teaching to hire an alumnus.

Lenson also noted "good cooperative relationships" already being developing with faculty and staff. He added how relaxed he (Hooker) seems yet maintaining a serious and intense personality.

"Human inspiration really counts and he's sort of an inspirational character himself," said Lenson, adding, "he just exudes energy."

Lenson compared his "emblematic" appointment to the turning over of power to a new generation of people born in the 1940s and 1950s.

"If he does what he says he's going to do, we'll be counting every penny of it," said Lenson.

Chairperson of the English department, Vincent DiMarco, said he is impressed by Hooker and his qualifications.

"He's had a spectacular career and is very sensitive to the concerns of the University," said DiMarco. "I'm pretty excited about it (the appointment)."

Looking back at the record

Hooker received his Ph.D. from UMass (Amherst) in 1973. He has served as president of Bennington College, Vermont, and as dean of undergraduate and graduate studies at the Johns Hopkins University.

While at Hopkins, he was given the prestigious Homewood Award "for outstanding service to students, to student life and to the university."

And at Bennington College, campus officials personally credited Hooker with raising more than $6 million to help form the college's first endowment fund and with increasing total gift support by 80 percent.

He is a specialist on the philosophers Descartes and Leibniz, and has devoted some of his scholarship to a study of medical ethics and ethical problems associated with biotechnology.

While at the University of Maryland Baltimore County, Hooker focused on increasing academic quality and improving access, especially for minority students.

During his years in the president's office, enrollment increased 20 percent and 150 percent in graduate programs. Student retention also improved, with the number of bachelor's degrees granted increasing by 53 percent.

"I have had a lot of success with minority programs and would love to see similar programs here," said Hooker.

He helped establish an Honors College and create the nationally-celebrated, multi-million-dollar Meyerhoff Scholarship Program for African Americans gifted in science and technology.

It has admitted more than 100 students in four years. In addition, he introduced high-tech laboratories in visual arts and geography to the campus, developed plans for a research park, and launched dozens of initiatives within state agencies, schools, groups-at-risk and afflicted communities.

Hooker said he hopes to maintain the post for ten years.

Hooker is also the author and editor of two books and a number of articles on philosphy, biotechnology and bioethics. He is a former Danforth Associate and Woodrow Wilson Dissertation fellow.

"In choosing Dr. Hooker to preside over what we intend will soon be a top-ranked institution," said Oakes, "we are relying on his vision, his obvious talents as a university administrator and his great gifts for motivating faculty, staff and students to excel."

Take a jaunt to a joke shop, gag your friends

By DAVID RIVERA
Collegian Staff

What in Amherst sells everything in pranks and jokes from electrified beer cans, garlic gum and double-sided quarters to crazy masks, rubber hands and other off-the-wall gags?

It's a place called "Joke City," located on North Pleasant Street next to The Mercantile.

Manager Nina Brooks, 21, is looking forward to the arrival of the college community who she hopes will be looking to grab some gags.

"We had a professor come in and buy a dead rat in a trap," Brooks said. "I think he's going to use it on the first day to break the tension."

Brooks hopes her joke shop will spark some giggles and guffaws throughout the campus community.

"I think this is just what Amherst needs. I think it helps people get through hard times," said Brooks. Most of her clientele have been high school students since the store opened in August.

But apparently not everyone feels the shop will be successful.

"I don't think most UMass students can afford to laugh," said Jen Stone, a senior zoology major. "But it might do well during the Halloween weekend."

Jeff McKenzie, a UMass marketing senior, said he thinks the store will do extremely well.

"That kind of stuff is a great impulse buy," he said.

McKenzie, who said he considers himself a practical joker, said he couldn't wait to try some of the gadgets on his friends.

MULLINS SKYDOME? — No, the Mullins Memorial Center will not have a retractable roof, the roof had just not been built at this point.

"(The Esplanade condominium) was the cheapest place shown to me by my Real Estate agent," said Hooker.

The full service luxury building, which has everything from valet parking, an indoor health club with an olympic-size swimming pool to concierge service and cleaning services, is the top building in Cambridge and one of the four nicest buildings in the Boston area, according to an Esplanade spokesperson.

The 13-story, 206-unit complex was built three years ago. The condominiums go for approximately $520,000 per unit and some sell for over $1 million.

Hooker will be overseeing the five-campus system from his central office in Boston and does not work at only one campus.

A special trustees's committee that studied compensation issues reported that the new president's housing allowance should range from $19,000 to $30,000. The panel's research showed average annual dollar value for housing allowances to presidents around the country is about $27,000.

According to Gordon Oakes, the cost of the apartment could supercede the national average by almost $7,000.

Oakes said the University is currently searching for a donated house in the Boston area for the president to reside.

In support of Hooker and his salary and benefits, Chairperson of the English department Vincent DiMarco compared his position and responsibilities to an executive of a major corporation.

"I have no problems with his salary, he has major responsibilities," said DiMarco. "$175,000 a year is a bargain.

The head of the faculty union is also supportive of Hooker's salary package and does not find the amount of his salary uncommon with other similar universities across the United States.

"The problem is not Hooker's salary being too high, but everyone else's (other faculty) being too low," said David Lenson.

Lenson did question where the money to increase salaries would originate from but was confident it wouldn't pose a problem. "We'll find a way," said Lenson.

While most faculty and staff members support Hooker's compensation package, the President of Student Government Association, Jennifer Wood, expressed concern over Hooker's "particularly extravagant" salary and housing benefits.

Wood questioned how the university will manage its scarce financial resources in a time when tuition and fees have almost doubled in the last four years.

"I think it's outrageous," said Wood, who said she thought it was especially insensitive during such difficult financial times for students.

Wood said she understood the need for a competitive salary but found his living arrangements "perverse and really foolhardy."

"There's nothing wrong with paying and treating him well, but within reason," said Wood. "I don't know if he needs to live in the most expensive place around."

Citing a need to build public support, she thought faculty pay raises would dampen statewide support of the University.

"I haven't heard anything about student's needs. I hope he does address our issues," said Wood.

that former Dean of Physical Education David Bischoff billed the University for eating lunch with a man who had been dead for 22 months.

The alleged widespread misappropriation of funds by the athletic department over a six-year period was so serious that the House Post Audit and Oversight Committee began subpoenaing documents and witnesses in May.

As a result, the investigation has delved into nearly every action and decision made by the athletic department.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien has hired a Springfield law firm to help the administration respond to requests for documents. "If there have been improprieties, they will be identified and corrected," said O'Brien in a June statement.

Trouble began in January with the resignation of former football coach Jim Reid over allegations that he had not been told of a department decision to eliminate five scholarships for the fall 1992 season.

The Collegian reported on February 7 that former Athletic Director Frank McInerney and former Dean of Physical Education David Bischoff knew about the scholarship cuts as early as last December.

The scrutiny of the athletic department's actions increased during the improper handling of the Reid resignation and the subsequent hiring in late April of head coach Mike Hodges after a 14-day "nationwide search" of candidates.

In May, controversy arose over alleged misuse of funds.

McInerney announced his retirement on May 4th, the same day that Bischoff was reassigned to associate chancellor and Mullins Center director. The two men have been at the center of the controversy.

The day after The Boston Globe reported that the House Committee had subpoenaed financial data from the athletic department in the wake of allegations of improper misuse of funds, Chancellor Richard O'Brien downplayed the seriousness of the allegations.

"Audits have been conducted routinely of athletic programs and there have been no indications of problems," O'Brien said in the campus newsletter, Campus Chronicle, in a speech to the Faculty Senate a week before the Globe story.

The House Committee has already subpoenaed over 30,000 documents as well as top administrators in the department.

Peter Kocot, chief of staff of the House Committee, said that the next public hearing will be held in mid-September, and may be on campus, depending on a number of factors.

In addition to financial data, the House Committee subpoenaed over the summer Bischoff and former exercise science department head Frank Katch, as well as Patricia Gladchuk and Maureen Kocot, their secretaries.

Gladchuk admitted at a Post Audit and Oversight Committee hearing to overseeing the destruction of public documents using a shredder from the sports department.

Heat turns up on Bischoff

The House Committee has spent a great deal of time focusing on Bischoff, who has come under fire for a number of trips and purchases on the state's tab.

Bischoff, according to last month's Springfield Union-News, billed the University $155 last summer for hotel and restaurant expenses compiled in New York City. In a sworn expense report, Bischoff claimed the lunch was to consult with an engineer on the Mullins Center, David Geiger.

Geiger, of Geiger Associates, has been dead for almost two years before the meeting and his firm did't do any work relating to the Mullins Center.

Bischoff also reportedly rented a Cadillac Seville on a trip last year, instead of less expensive cars which were available, according to the July 3 Amherst Bulletin. The Post Audit and Oversight Committee also questioned purchases made in the 1980's by Bischoff for items such as tennis balls and racquets, shoes, fishing equipment and plate glass.

Bischoff resigned on July 3 after a month and a half of scrutiny by the House and the press over his expense accounts.

"The recent innuendos and insinuations made against me will, in time, be dispelled. Fighting such innuendos will take energy, time and attention away from any new responsibilities," said Bischoff in a press conference.

Katch-22

In 1989, Katch, who was at the time both the exercise science head and a paid consultant for Hydra Fitness, obtained $142,000 of equipment from Hydra Fitness for two on-campus health clubs he had founded, according to a June article of the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Katch purchased the equipment without going through the University policy of competitive bidding. Gladchuk testified before the House Committee that Bischoff was most likely aware of Katch's conflict of interest.

Katch, in the June 2 Boston Globe, said, "I am as surprised at this [subpoena] as I am of being told I was a second-round pick of the Celtics. What I don't understand is why me? I'm not the department head anymore."

Where the department stands now

On June 10, Chancellor Richard O'Brien announced the formation of an internal probe, to be overseen by Provost Glen Gordon, into the allegations of the athletic department's policies.

In addition, O'Brien also announced the law firm of Bulkey, Richardson and Gelinas of Springfield will assist the University in responding to the House's subpoenas of documents.

Some of the public documents may have confidential information, such as student financial aid or tax information, and social security numbers, which the University has an obligation to protect, said O'Brien.

"I believe it will be very helpful to have the independent perspective which external legal counsel can provide," said O'Brien in a prepared statement.

In addition, UMass has taken steps to fill the vacancies left by Bischoff and McInerney. On July 31, Glenn M. Wong was named acting Dean of Physical Education to replace Bischoff. Wong was formerly in the department of sport studies. Wong was subpoenaed but has yet to testify before the committee.

The Athletic Director spot has proven more difficult to fill.

On August 20, when it became apparent that a AD would not be in place by the beginning of the fall sports season, O'Brien moved Wong to the position of interim Athletic Director. Gordon assumed the role of Dean of Physical Education until a permanent Athletic Director is named, whereupon Wong will become Dean.

On May 4, O'Brien announced the athletic department's budget will become part of the Chancellor's budget, separating it from the School of Physical Education's budget, which is under the Provost.

Ironically, O'Brien was the Provost, who is also the Dean of Physical Education's boss, during most of the allegations of misappropriations.

TIMELINE

JANUARY 23 — UMass head football coach Jim Reid quits over a scholarship controversy within the athletic department.

FEBRUARY 14 — Official resignation of Reid.

FEB. 21 — Reid hired as assistant head coach at the University of Richmond.

APRIL 22 — Assistant football coach Mike Hodges named head coach despite a 6-2 vote by the search committee to extend the head coach application deadline, which had expired.

MAY 4 — Athletic Director Frank McInerney retires; Dean of Physical Education David Bischoff relinquishes title and is reassigned to Director of the Mullins Center.

— Chancellor Richard O'Brien announces that the athletic budget will be separated from the Provost's Office and will become part of the Chancellor's budget.

MAY 21 — The Boston Globe reports the House Post Audit and Oversight committee has subpoenaed financial data for allegations of misappropriation of funds.

MAY 22 — Campus Chronicle: "Chancellor Richard O'Brien told the Faculty Senate last week that audits have been conducted routinely of athletic programs and there have been no indications of problems."

MAY 31 — Sunday Republican reports Bischoff charged UMass $1,569 for the NCAA convention in Anaheim, CA and $231 for expenses in San Diego two days before the convention.

McInerney, Assistant Athletic Director Elaine Sortino, and Associate Athletic Department Head Al Rufe reportedly spent a combined total of $5,745.

JUNE 2 — Bischoff and former exercise science department head Frank Katch are issued subpoenas by the House Committee.

Associated Press reports Bischoff billed UMass $87 for a trip to Connecticut to watch a UConn-Yale football game. Bischoff defended the trip, reportedly saying he was "scouting" for the UMass football team.

Records indicate he checked into a hotel at 2:32 p.m., during the middle of the game.

JUNE 10 — O'Brien announces an internal probe into the School of Physical Education due to allegations that have arisen concerning the athletic department.

JUNE 12 — University Ombudsman Janet Rifkin rules there were no procedural violations in the hiring of head football coach Hodges. UMass English professor Donald Junkins files a grievance with the Ombudsman's office, claiming the hiring may have violated affirmative action.

House Post Audit and Oversight Committee visits UMass for the second time in two days to gather nearly 8,000 pages of documents and conduct interviews.

JUNE 24 — Public hearings of the House Committee begin; subpoenaed documents show Katch bought $145,000 worth of equipment from Hydra-Fitness for UMass during the time he was a paid consultant of the Hydra-Fitness Corporation.

JULY 3 — Bischoff resigns, says he will spend his time battling allegations.

JULY 8 — House Committee reopens hearings to the public.

JULY 31 — Glenn M. Wong named acting dean of the School of Physical Education, effective July 20.

JULY 27 — Springfield Union-News reveals Bischoff, in a sworn expense account, claimed he consulted with David Geiger of Geiger Associates, an engineering firm, on the Mullins Center during a trip to New York City.

Geiger had been dead for 22 months before the meeting and Geiger Associates had nothing to do with the Mullins Center. Bischoff compiled $155 of expenses on hotel and restaurant expenses.

AUGUST 4 and 7 — The House subpoenas financial records from three private businesses with ties to the UMass athletic department: Design Supply Studio, owned by Mr. & Mrs. David Bischoff; The Fran-Tek company, owned by Tekla McInerney, wife of former Athletic Director Frank McInerney; and the Hadley branch of Rocky's Home Center, which has an open account with the School of Physical Education, according to James Patulak, head of building operations as reported in the August 27 Daily Hampshire Gazette.

AUGUST 20 — Wong named interim Athletic Director, effective September 1, and replaces McInerney. Wong was moved after only one month as acting Dean of Physical Education.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

Summer Vacation

As you may remember, the end of last semester was a turbulent time for the Collegian. People of the community and several of our editors expressed great discontent with certain aspects of the Collegian, from election procedures for editors and general policies to actual paper content. Things became quite tense for awhile for all concerned, and then the semester was over. But, we did not just sit back and rest the issues for the summer. . .

Collegian staffers and dissatisfied editors met in Cambridge and Amherst several times during the summer with the Harvard Negotiation Project. Our goal was to further work through our difficulties in a calmer atmosphere and come to some positive resolutions.

The Harvard mediators enabled all of us to look at both perspectives so as to better understand the motives involved. Our sessions resulted in some very productive ideas and definite resolutions about changing the way things work at the Collegian. For example, the election process for diversity editorships agreed to in the spring (editors elected by staff of that desk only, not by whole newsroom) has been adopted by the rest of the newsroom. This prevents the previous unfairness of staff voting for editors they may not have even met.

We are still working with the Harvard Negotiation Project, and will continue that contact throughout the semester. We are constantly striving in a positive direction with this communication. We hope to keep up the trend of resolving things and eventually have a productive, full newsroom. Peace is productive.

In the meantime, we are heartily welcoming new writers. We love to see a bustling newsroom, and you probably wouldn't mind seeing your name and your own words in print for all of UMass to see. To change the Collegian, be part of the Collegian. We get lonely down here in the basement and we want your company and your contributions. We have two doors and they're always open. So c'mon and make our day — stretch those writing muscles and let 19,000 people read your masterpiece.

An unsigned editorial reflects the views of a majority of the Collegian staff.

Commitment to equality

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian welcomes undergraduates of all cultures, backgrounds and ethnicities. We insure equal opportunity and access for all undergraduates to all aspects of the newspaper. We shall continue to insure this access, and to combat racism of all forms.

UMass: the theme park

Summer break isn't a vacation. It's a three-month internship in real life.

Like most in-state students from the middle class, I worked nearly every day between Memorial Day and Labor Day in order to make enough money to return to school. Sipping blender drinks and watching game shows all summer long would have been nice, but such bourgeoisie pursuits were simply out of the question. So was travel, unless you consider Lenox, Mass., an "exotic locale." There were no options: it was work or stay home in September.

Greg
SUKIENNIK

My summer getaway spot was Guido's Fresh Marketplace (conveniently located on Routes 7 and 20 on the Pittsfield-Lenox line, if you want to see it). I could tell you whatever you wanted to know about the fruit and produce business, because that's what I've done with the past four summers. I've trimmed celery and set up fruit displays. I've scrubbed floors, rotated stock and drunk alarming amounts of coffee. I got to like my job, but I also never forgot that my purpose was to make as much money for school as possible.

It wasn't hard work like paving roads (haven't done it) or digging graves in a cemetery (that I've done). But the place does good business, and is a favorite with obnoxious tourists from the greater New York area, so I was kept busy. To cap it off, though I made decent money, the job had all the intellectual challenge of drilling holes in sheet metal, and just about as much job satisfaction. I did like my job, but many's the time I picked up my broom, looked at the floor and thought, "Why am I here?"

What, you may ask, happened to all the wonderful money I made? I sent most of it to the same place you did — the Bursar's office in Whitmore. Ever notice the Bursar's office is set up like a bank? But they won't give you a toaster or a set of four UMass glasses for starting an account. Too bad. I could really use a toaster.

In comparison to the workaday world, college is an ideal experience. As students, we essentially control our own destinies. We choose our own classes, careers, goals and actions with little outside influence, save the school's graduation requirements. It's an existence so free it's almost gypsy-like. You want to blow off classes today? No one's stopping you. Want to join the Young Republicans? Hey, it's your life, bucko.

Out there, such luxuries as control of one's destiny are known only to the well-to-do. Chances are, your job won't be fun. Heck, you might not even wind up doing what your degree allegedly prepared you for. Have you heard the stories about history majors selling shoes and education grads working in supermarkets? Hate to spoil it for you, but they're all too true.

But to pay off those huge insurance bills, that new car loan or the mortgage, you gotta do what you can, even if it really sucks. Throw in a couple kids to feed and clothe, and you're really in the hole. If you're an astronomer and Mt. Polomar isn't hiring and you've got bills to pay, garbage collection doesn't seem like such a bad job after all.

In my short time in the work force, I've met a lot of people who don't like what they do for a living, but put up with it anyway because their backs are against the wall. There's a single mother of two, putting her children through a private high school, a teacher who can't get a job in this state and has a mortgage to pay, recent college grads who can't find other work — I could continue.

That, friends, it the real world. No glamour, no prizes, no "job satisfaction," just punch the clock, pay the bills, and do it again. Dreams of what could've or might've been are left behind for more pragmatic concerns, like "What will I eat?" and "Where will I sleep?" One need only take a look around to find people for whom these questions are unanswered — the homeless. Without that drab job you hate so much, you might wind up amongst their swelling ranks. Don't laugh; they probably didn't think it would ever happen to them, either.

Compared to the grim reality of "work, work, work," UMass is actually like a giant theme park. You pay one admission price, albeit an expensive one, and the park is yours to roam all semester long.

Pretend the administrators are dancing mechanized bears, and those political activists over there are giant cartoon characters, and you might as well be in Disney World. You could call it "Liberal Fantasy Land." One note of warning though — all the rides veer sharply to the left.

If you worked this past summer, not just because you wanted spending cash but because you needed the money to make it back here, then you know the difference between UMass and 9-to-5 is a huge one. Pat yourself on the back for a summer internship well spent. You didn't get credit for it, and the money's probably spent by now, but it was a valuable experience all the same.

Take advantage of the freedom UMass has to offer while you can: you'll be in college only four or five short years, but you'll be a working stiff well into the next century.

Enjoy your day at "Liberal Fantasy Land."

Search for a role model difficult in the modern world

When I was very young my parents called me into the kitchen one evening to ask me a question.

It was a simple enough question, asked of many children in the United States and around the world. But now I see that question's answer carries a special insight into the future adult growing in a child's head.

"Marc," they asked me, "Who is your hero?"

I stood there under the collective gaze of my parents for a few moments and thought long and hard for a full minute before answering: "I don't know."

I suppose I could have said Buck Rogers. I was watching that television show at the time. But who can respect someone who spent so much time dressed like that?

Years later, a few months before my high school graduation, the question again came back for an answer. Fearing I might end up having to attend the infamous "ZooMass," I was applying for a ROTC scholarship hoping sell the navy four years of my life in exchange for the money I'd need to attend a school with fewer budget problems.

"What world figure do you admire most?" the navy wanted to know.

Again I didn't have any ideas other than maybe I liked Desmond Tutu and Woody Allen made cool movies. I don't think it was the answer the navy was looking for, but it was the only one I had. I didn't get the scholarship, thankfully. I really don't think I'm military material.

So, who is my hero? Or maybe it's heroine? Who do I most admire? Who is it that I want to emulate and pattern my life after? Any of these questions could easily translate into: What do I stand for and who do I know that best represents this? I still don't know the answer. But I do know that deciding on a hero is serious business.

Marc
ELLIOTT

As I write this the people living in and around Naples, Idaho are idealizing Randal Weaver, a white supremacist who has barricaded himself and his family in a fortress-like cabin threatening to shoot any federal officers who try to take him in. I would ask these people to rethink giving this man the title "hero." They would be better off trying to emulate the actions of William Degan, the U.S. Marshal who died because he didn't want to harm Weaver's misguided and heavily armed teenage son (who ended up dying anyway thanks to Weaver's trigger-happy neighbor).

A few months ago some were hailing the rioters and looters in Los Angeles as heroes. While their anger was understandable, violence isn't. I'll never believe in sacrificing one ideal for another.

Television and the film industry provides plenty of material for people to choose their heroes from. Unfortunately, the Terminators and Chuck Norrises have been chosen over the real-life Martin Luther Kings far too often. Besides, I couldn't trust a hero who didn't have the strength to live in the real world.

I think think we may all have to just chuck the idea of heroes and role models.

Maybe it's time for all of us to be our own heroes, time to take responsibility for our own lives. It's time to stop looking to someone else to define who we are and what we value. Maybe, just maybe, it's time for each individual think about what he or she values and how their actions relate.

Dostoevsky's Grand Inquisitor believed that people feared freedom and yearned for someone to tell them what was right and wrong, how they should live their lives. They preferred to live under someone else's direction. I hope that isn't the case.

You might still want to find the heroes. I wish you luck and ask you to take great care in your choices. I guess I'll still keep an eye out, but to tell the truth, I'll settle for finding people I can respect and respect me. They won't, I hope, define who I am though. That's my job.

Visit to Health Services exposes a sick system

This is about stealing that has the state's imprimatur, about a state health care worker who offers students abortion pills, about a University of Massachusetts bursar with a yellow streak up his back, about a health facility that should be shut down, about a situation that should have been exposed months ago.

But I didn't want to rock the boat then. I didn't want to put my daughter at risk of not getting into the courses she needs to graduate. I didn't want to embarrass her. I still don't.

My oldest daughter is a senior at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst. Last week her tuition bill arrived. In the long list of student fees, there it was — the mandatory undergraduate health fee. For next semester, the cost is $197.50. Last semester it was $185.25. I paid it then because I was being blackmailed. But I am not going to pay it now.

Beverly BECKHAM

Last December, my daughter visited Health Services. A week before Christmas, she awakened in the middle of the night with severe stomach pains. Her roommate drove her to Health Services, where a nurse practitioner took her temperature and blood pressure and told her to come back in the morning for blood work.

She returned to her room, in acute pain. She waited until 9 a.m. Then her roommate drove her back to the clinic. After filling out some forms, she was sitting in a public area waiting for a doctor, when a Health Services employee approached her and announced, "So you're here to take an M.A.P.?"

"What's an M.A.P.?" my daughter asked. The woman said, "It's a morning after pill." My daughter said no, she wasn't here for that and before she could explain what was wrong with her, the employee demanded: "So you're here for a pregnancy test then?"

"I'm here because I'm sick," my daughter said, then started to cry.

On the phone a few hours later, she was still crying.

"They treated me like a walking sexual disease, Mom, and I couldn't do anything about it. When I saw the doctor, the first thing she asked was if I had any sexual diseases. All I had was a stomach ache. I was so humiliated, but I was in so much pain I couldn't even leave."

I wrote to the Director of Nursing, describing what had happened, explaining that my daughter would not be using Health Services again, and informing her that I had deducted the compulsory health service fee from the tuition.

"I need to inform you that the student health fee is compulsory and mandated by state law and if the health fee is not paid, Lauren may have difficulty in registering for courses," Catherine Burbank wrote back.

I called Catherine Burbank. She suggested I phone the bursar, Robert Mishol. I did. He listened to my story and said that Lauren would be expelled from school if I did not pay the health services fee. "What do you think would happen if every parent just suddenly decided not to pay this fee?" he asked.

Health care would get better? I suggested. Young people wouldn't be treated like undesirables?

I told Mishol the clinic was wrong. The person who approached my daughter had no right to make the assumptions she did, no right to ask highly personal questions in public place, and no right to offer her a drug whose use is legal only under very limited circumstances.

"There's nothing anybody can do about it," Mishol told me.

"You mean there's no one above you?" I asked.

"That's right," he said.

When I mentioned that the day they expelled my daughter, there would be a Herald photographer taking her picture as she moved out, he suggested that perhaps the vice-chancellor could help. He gave his word that he would not initiate expulsion until I had heard from her.

Mishol lied. The next thing I knew I was holding a letter informing me that my daughter had been "withdrawn" from the university.

I paid the $185.25 health fee. I paid the $25 late fee. If I hadn't, my daughter would have suffered even more.

But now it's tuition time again, and there's that fee. If I don't pay it by Aug. 7, Lauren's classes will be deleted by the computer, she won't be allowed back at school, and she won't graduate next June.

If I do pay it, I am supporting a clinic that demeans young women, provides inferior care, and brazenly breaks the law by offering an experimental abortion drug that is at best immoral and unsafe, and at worst in this case illegal.

Polling Section offers portrait of the UMass community

Here it is, the Collegian Polling Section. In each Wednesday's Collegian we will pose one or several questions pertaining to current issues of national, international and local scope. Over the course of the year these questions will range from, for example, the presidential candidates and the election to abortion, pornography, the L.A. riots, what will make UMass a better place, etc. Preceding the questions will be the facts of the issue and an analysis. You can phone in your answers on our Collegian polling line (545-1749) between 4 and 8 p.m. on Wednesday .

Anna
SHEPP-CARDOZA

In Monday's Collegian we will print the results of each poll and share with you what the 25,000 students and professors at UMass think about the issues and what these results imply.

Well, we're commencing yet another academic year. UMass is comprised of a great variety of people, from differing religious, ethnic and socio-economic backgrounds. Our world views run the gamut and are both influenced by and affect our values, beliefs, attitudes and lifestyles. So who are we, the UMass population? What do we believe? How do we think? How do we perceive ourselves and how do we think others perceive us? Your responses to the following questions will help us to begin to find the answers.

Save this list of questions so you will be prepared and able to respond appropriately when you call the polling line:

1. Do you consider yourself politically:
   1. conservative
   2. liberal

CAMPAIGNING TOGETHER — Arkansas Gov. and Democratic presidential candidate Bill Clinton and his wife Hillary campaign together in Tampa.

Rep. Kennedy: Bush forgot Boston Harbor

BY EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Four years after George Bush visited Boston Harbor to blast his 1988 Democratic rival's record on the environment, Bill Clinton's campaign charged Tuesday that the president has done little to help clean the dirty waterway.

"If his record on the cleanup of Boston Harbor is any indication of trustworthiness, then the president is up the Charles without a paddle," said U.S. Rep. Joseph Kennedy, D-Mass., who heads the Clinton-Gore campaign effort in Massachusetts.

Tuesday marked the fourth anniversary of then-Vice President Bush's ride on the polluted harbor. Bush used the event to place some of the blame for delays in cleaning the dirty harbor on his opponent, then-Gov. Michael S. Dukakis.

Kennedy said that despite the campaign rhetoric of 1988, Bush failed to request funding to help pay for the $6 billion harbor cleanup in the first and second years of his presidency. Bush requested $100 million for the harbor last year and is seeking another $100 million in the 1993 budget.

Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci, Bush's regional campaign chairman, said blame for climbing water and sewer rates lies with Dukakis for failing to apply for federal funds while they were available

"All I'm saying is, it's a matter of historical fact that the Dukakis administration missed the boat," Cellucci said. "When massive amounts of federal aid were available, they failed to apply."

Cellucci said the state has received $223 million in a combination of grants and loans to help clean up the harbor since 1989, that another $51 million is expected, and that $100 million has been included in the 1993 budget.

Water and sewer rates in the metropolitan Boston area have risen from an average of $140 per year in 1985 to about $535 per year today, with the bulk of the costs going for sewer improvements mandated under the court-ordered cleanup. Residents in the region are expected to pay an average of nearly $1,200 per year by 1999, according to the Massachusetts Water Resources Authority, the agency responsible for the cleanup.

Kennedy said members of the Massachusetts congressional delegation and not the Bush administration pushed for Boston Harbor money to be included in the federal budget.

"Believe me, when both the '92 and '93 budgets were first proposed, there wasn't any money in [for] Boston Harbor," Kennedy said. "That's [U.S. Rep] Joe Moakley's $100 million, not George Bush's."

Moakley (D-Mass.) is the dean of the state's congressional delegation.

Kennedy called on Bush to promise $1 billion in federal support over the next five years toward the harbor cleanup. He refused to say how much money Clinton would put toward the effort; saying the Arkansas governor plans to make other changes to ease the burden on Boston-area ratepayers.

Clinton proposes allowing Superfund cleanup money to be used in the harbor cleanup; going after polluters to force them to pay their share of the cost; and making changes in the Clean Water Act to prevent pollutants from reaching the harbor as well as increasing direct funding, Kennedy said.

There are a lot of papers floating around the Pioneer Valley nowadays.

But there's only one Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

Now, we're not necessarily making a value judgment with that statement. We're simply saying that there's only one Massachusetts Daily Collegian. And that's a completely valid thing to say. It's not a claim, it's not a distortion, it's a fact. Plain and simple.

Research funding cuts put apples in jeopardy

By Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Apples are a $25 million crop in Massachusetts, and after cranberries the second most abundant fruit crop in the state, but the research needed to assure future harvests is in danger of funding cuts, according to University of Massachusetts scientists.

"Alar and apples grabbed the headlines a few years ago," explained Daniel Cooley of the department of Plant Pathology at UMass. "UMass research helped growers produce apples without Alar, and we have shown how to reduce dependence on many other agricultural chemicals, too."

For nearly 30 years, the Horticultural Research Center (HRC) at the University of Massachusetts has studied ways to improve the state's apple crop.

Using a variety of techniques, researchers at UMass have helped growers cut pesticide use on apples by an average of 40 percent since 1979, according to Cooley.

The University's 150 acre Horticultural Research Center, located in Belchertown, is located about ten miles from the campus on land donated by the Massachusetts Fruit Growers Association thirty years ago.

"One of the techniques pioneered at our Belchertown Center is our IPM, or Integrated Pest Management program," said Cooley. "IPM is a way of managing diseases, insects and weeds using fewer pesticides — and in smaller amounts."

The IPM program's success at UMass has helped the HRC achieve an international reputation, according to Cooley.

"Using fewer chemicals makes our region's apples more attractive to consumers and commercial producers," Cooley explained. "That may help explain why $5 million of our state's apple crop sold in England last year."

Another UMass researcher, plant and soil science professor Wesley Autio, explained that Massachusetts' growers are now leading the nation in ecologically-sound apple production.

"UMass researchers and the Cooperative Extension System have been an important asset for growers — especially after having to make the transition to growing apples without Alar," said Autio.

The use of chemicals is not just a growers issue," said Autio. "By maintaining profitable orchards we maintain open space and local supplies of fresh fruit. In an increasingly suburban setting, growers get more and more pressure to reduce pesticide use. It's tough, but growers and the University have been meeting the challenge successfully.

"This tradition of leadership is threatened, however, as cuts to the University have translated into staff cuts at our Belchertown research site," said Autio. "Our faculty are still here, but we are essentially losing our lab and technicians."

In two years, the orchard staff has shrunk from six full-time workers and two technicians to one orchard worker and one technician supported from the sale of fruit at the Center.

At the same time, the Cooperative Extension System, the development and teaching arm for the College of Food and Natural Resources has been slashed nearly 80 percent.

"Efforts by the Massachusetts Fruit Growers' Association have helped stave off complete collapse of the facility, but long-term solutions are being sought," said Cooley.

helping the less fortunate seems to have penetrated their views of themselves," she said.

To explain why a sense of life's purpose "took a nosedive" between 1977 and 1988, Whitbourne said, "It has to be an effect of the culture, not a function of age or the so-called mid-life crisis. People talk about the effects of Reaganism all the time, but it's incredible to see it verified in a personality study like this.

"In the '90s, as people look for a way to put more meaning back in their lives, will we see a return to the old values of helping others?" she mused.

Whitbourne said she predicts society may see a return to placing more values on families and family life, perhaps couples choosing to have more children.

Hay fever reigns again

Peaking pollen is nothing to sneeze at

By BRUCE SCHWOEGLER
Associated Press

BOSTON — Hay fever, an allergic reaction to pollen primarily wafted from ragweed plants, is headed toward its annual peak.

Pollen counts should continue to be high for the next two weeks and then slowly taper off. Mold spores and sage, a newcomer among irritating weeds, add to the suffering. Dr. Jack Farnham, a Chelmsford allergist and pollen expert, believes that this year's highest counts will come a week beyond the normal Labor Day apex because of the weather. The unusually wet and cool summer has slowed plant maturation.

It has also encouraged proliferation. We could be headed toward a pollen-count banner year. That depends upon weather conditions during these next few weeks. If temperatures are above normal, little rain falls and moderate winds blow. Counts will soar to 300 or more grains of ragweed pollen in a cubic meter of air, the size of the space in your refrigerator.

Moisture in the form of rain, fog or even dew is the most significant inhibitor of pollen transport. If you have hay fever, pray for rain. Add light winds and cold morning temperatures to your pleas because they also limit pollen counts. Winds of 10-20 mph and morning temperatures above 48 degrees prod counts higher.

Ragweed is uniquely our own. The weed is rarely spotted elsewhere and mainly spouts on U.S. lands that have been disturbed. Early settlers found none. Sneezes came from their grandchildren and persist today. It is often confused with goldenrod, a yellow flowering plant that flourishes nearby. Northern Maine, southern Florida and much of the West beyond the Rockies have little if any ragweed. The Midwest, South and even portions of far western New England are loaded.

But in most of our region, counts of 300 are unusual. That's low in Milwaukee, Chicago., St. Louis, Detroit and Buffalo where tallies may soar to 500. A count of only ten pollen grains brings on symptoms. At 20, everybody who is susceptible, about one-fifth of the population, notes discomfort. Counts of 100 and beyond produce strong allergic reactions.

Pollen counts are taken during the morning when microscopic pollen grains are emitted from plants. This measurement indicates the particle concentration in the immediate area. Since few measuring stations exist in New England, the count only serves as a general yardstick of regional severity. Sometimes it can be misleading. Heavy rains might briefly cleanse the air near the measuring station while other dry locales continue high counts.

Westboro gunman arraigned

Westboro, Mass. (AP) — A gunman who barricaded himself in a hotel suite and held off police for 19 hours was arraigned Thursday on assault and weapons charges.

Ernest Schritter, 38, pleaded innocent in Westboro District Court to five charges, including assault and battery with a dangerous weapon on a state trooper. He faces a maximum of 10 years in prison if convicted on that charge.

Schritter, an Oklahoma native, was arrested Wednesday afternoon after police lobbed tear gas into the suite at the Marriott Residence Inn where the seige began Tuesday evening. No one was injured.

The suspect was being held on $200,000 cash bail in the Worcester House of Corrections, Westboro Police Lt. Glenn Parker said.

Schritter locked himself inside the suite with his wife, Teresa, and two children after police were called to the inn in response to an argument between Schritter and his wife.

The children, ages 14 and 6, were taken from the suite Tuesday night. Teresa Schritter left late Wednesday morning.

Teresa Schritter said the police presence made her husband even more confrontational. She said Schritter wanted her to stay with him so police would be less likely to storm the suite.

"He was mostly afraid that they were going to bust in on him and take him and kill him," she said.

"He had me convinced that both of us were going to die before the thing was over with."

Schritter had stored a number of weapons, including a Chinese assault rifle, and thousands of rounds of ammunition in the hotel suite, Parker said.

"He had a small ammo dump in his bedroom," Parker said. "He could have held off a small army for a couple of days."

Job loss high in region

NE lost 500,000 jobs in two years

By JOHN DIAMOND
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — New England lost a greater portion of its jobs during the two-year economic slump than any other region of the country, according to a report issued Tuesday by a Congressional study group.

Employment in New England dropped 7.7 percent from June 1990 to June of this year. Four New England states were the nation's biggest losers in the percentage of jobs lost.

In all, the region lost 500,000 jobs in the two years after the recession began. One of every five of the 2.4 million jobs lost nationwide was in New England.

The figures were compiled by the Northeast-Midwest Congressional Coalition, a group of lawmakers from the region, based on calculations by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The figures are for non-farm payroll employment.

Rhode Island had the sharpest job loss in the nation with 8.9 percent, followed by Connecticut, which lost 8.2 percent. Massachusetts was third, down by 7.8 percent, and New Hampshire was fourth with 7.5 percent decline.

Despite the small size of these states, New England rivaled larger states in terms of raw number of jobs lost. California, New York and New Jersey lost the most jobs over the two years covered by the survey. But Massachusetts was fourth, losing 236,400 jobs. Connecticut ranked sixth, just behind Florida, with 136,800 jobs lost.

Wayne Ayers, chief economist of the Bank of Boston, said the figures compiled by the coalition matched his own research.

"Just in New England alone, this has been a three year recession for us, the deepest since the 1930s," Ayers said.

The recovery in Northeast will mirror that across the country; slow and painful, Ayers said. It will take most of the rest of the decade to get those lost jobs back. "That's a measure of how slow this recovery will be," Ayers said.

The coalition report underscores the role of the real estate market crash in the region's economic slide. In each of the New England states, construction industry workers took the hardest hit. New England lost 30 percent of its construction work-force during the two-year period. In Massachusetts, that translated into 32,000 jobs lost.

The banking, insurance and real estate sector fared little better, losing one job in every twelve across New England. Massachusetts lost 17,000 jobs in that sector and Connecticut lost 8,400.

The decline in manufacturing hit those two states hard, costing Massachusetts 61,000 jobs and Connecticut 33,100. The 8.5 percent decline in Rhode Island's banking, insurance employment and real estate employment — a loss of 1,100 jobs was the sharpest decline in the nation.

Cutbacks in wholesale and retail jobs contributed the most to the job loss total. Of the 500,500 jobs lost in New England, 160,000 came from wholesale and retail trade sector.

Massachusetts experienced the sharpest drop in federal, state and local government employment in the Northeast and was second only to New York in the nation. The Bay State lost 25,900 government jobs, 6.4 percent of the state's total.

Farm sale to benefit UMass

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

When Robert Tilden died, his daughters Doris Tilden Little and Winifred Tilden Gelinas inherited the 20.7 acre Tilden Farm in North Marshfield. Now, plans are underway to add the farm to a protected "greenway" in the South Shore community while aiding needy students at the University of Massachusetts.

The partnership between the University and the Tilden family began when Winifred died last September and left her half of the farm to the University.

Her sister, Doris Little, also wanted to support public higher education while protecting the family farm from development. Working with Roger Hewett, director of planned giving in the University's development office, Mrs. Little arranged to buy her sisters share of the farm from the University for $200,000 and donate the farm to the Massachusetts Audubon Society.

The University will use the $200,000 to endow the Robert G. and Dorothy P. Tilden Scholarship fund. The annual earnings from the fund will be awarded to students in the Stockbridge School of Agriculture based on scholarship and need.

At the same time, Doris and her husband, W. Torrey Little, have also agreed to other estate arrangements in what may eventually total seven-figure bequest to create an endowment at the University. The annual earnings of the endowment are to be used without restriction by the Amherst campus administration.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien calls the Littles' gifts extremely generous and imaginative.

"These are difficult times for public higher education, and very large gifts such as the Littles' are all the more important because they occur so infrequently," O'Brien said.

Harry Mosher, director of the Stockbridge School, says the Littles have made an unbelievably wonderful contribution to the University while preserving a valuable piece of land.

"In this day and age of bleak fiscal conditions, this is a bright spot," Mosher said. "It is good to see some people recognize the importance of public higher education and are willing to support it."

Hewett praised the gift arrangement for supporting two important goals — conservancy and education.

"The bequest also recognizes the importance of the flagship campus to the entire commonwealth," Hewlett said.

For her part, Mrs. Little is happy to join in her sister's support for the University and protect the farm at the same time.

"I'm so happy we could do this," she said. "My father loved this farm and now it will always be here."

Meanwhile, Children's Hospital of Boston, which owns the nearby Fish Homestead where the Littles' now live, intends to preserve that 41-acre site from development.

What a difference D'angelo makes

Burgers can get pretty boring year after year, burger after burger at one of those big burger chains.

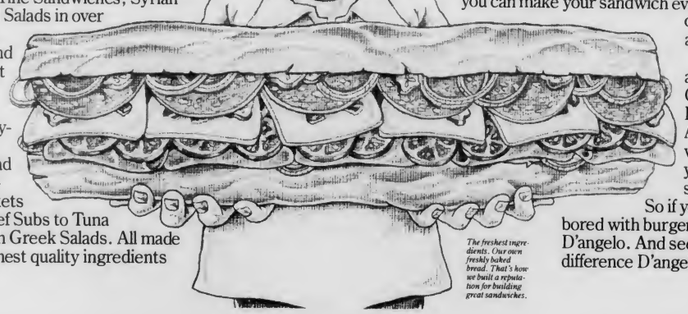
But at D'angelo, we're big on lots of different choices. With Submarine Sandwiches, Syrian Pokkets and Salads in over 40 different varieties. And four different sizes.

You can choose everything from Seafood Salad Subs to Vegetarian Pokkets to Roast Beef Subs to Tuna Subs to fresh Greek Salads. All made with the highest quality ingredients we can find. And bread we bake ourselves.

There are lots of little extras you can get too. Like fresh mushrooms, bacon or sweet peppers. Or whatever. And you can make your sandwich even more of a meal with a bowl of soup.

D'angelo also makes Great Divides. A 29" long version of your favorite sandwich.

So if you're getting bored with burgers, come to D'angelo. And see what a difference D'angelo makes.



The freshest ingredients. Our own freshly baked bread. That's how we built a reputation for building great sandwiches.

TPC's debut CD offers engineered horror pop

Run Silent, Run Deep
Terminal Power Company
Beggars Banquet

The brutal British duo John Roome and Paul Aspel, which form the Terminal Power Company, have just released their debut album Run Silent, Run Deep.

This album is a fusion of rock, rap, industrial, dance and dub film music. What do all those clever catch words mean to you? This album gives you the feeling that you may have heard this album before, perhaps on a Miami Vice episode, an INXS album or a Nintendo game.

The album jacket does not credit either member with instruments, but with the odious title of "engineers." A very urban, modern sound that sometimes lapses into the eerie, this is not a CD I'd listen to late at night.

Slightly abrasive but danceable this eclectic mix of sounds ranges from agony you can groove to on the opening track, "The Hunger, The Heat" to the love song "Deeper" with touching lyrics such as "Carve your name across my skin/ Engrave your name, beyond within." "Deeper" does manage to be haunting despite the tossed in electronic beeps.

If you have any serious emotional problems this review has a warning label for you. Despite the nonsensical lyrics in "Burning Chrome" it does evoke some imagery with lines like, "Like a puppet dancing violently, cut my strings and set me free, turn me loose."

"Fire (Walk with Me)" is the most "pop" song on the album. I could listen to this one over and over if only because it's the least masochistic of the collection.

One theme to the album, which makes it socially conscious and thus very politically correct, is its many references throughout to urban decay and despair.

The oh so danceable happy beat of "Wired" contrasts sharply with the absolutely morbid possibly drug induced lyrics: "Full of junk, a naked lunch/She closes her eyes in disbelief/ to hide her fear, to fight her grief/ your face is just a former shell/ I see you now/see you in hell."

The album wraps with the seven minute long "Urban Psycho" an unsettling, spooky bit of fun that lets the duo's accents slip through with these happy thoughts, "All too human/ Your all insane."

Pick up the album for a quick bit of pop horror with a lot of rhythm.

There's a lot more than a great calculator waiting for you when you purchase an HP 48SX or an HP 48S between June 1, 1992, and October 31, 1992. You'll get a bonus book that's good for free software, a free PC link cable and hundreds of dollars back on applications—like electrical and mechanical engineering—memory cards, training tools, games, and HP's infrared printer.

It's a really big offer. Worth more than $500. And it's going to make your HP 48 calculator even more valuable to you. The free serial cable lets you exchange information with your PC. And the free software disk lets you enter and plot equations easily, do 3D plotting, and analyze polynomials.

Beyond all the bonuses, you'll have the right calculator for your most challenging classes. HP 48 calculators have over 2100 built-in functions and offer a unique combination of graphics and calculus.

Head over to the campus bookstore now. After all, you don't see this kind of deal every day. HP calculators. The best for your success.

First Week will make you kick up your heels

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

"Putting our best foot forward" is this year's theme to First Week, sponsored by The Division of Student Activities at UMass.

WEDNESDAY

Tonight enjoy "Quetzal," a performance of Latin American music, in the Campus Center Auditorium beginning at 8 p.m. The concert will take you across the entire spectrum of Latin American music, including Andean (from Bolivia, Peru and Chile), Calypso (from Trinidad), Cumbia (from Colombia), Joropo (from Venezuela), Samba/Bossa Nova (from Brazil), Son Cubano, and contemporary Latin American music.

Your tour guides on this musical escapade are Eugenio Huanca on traditional Andean instruments, Alfredo Chapelliquen and Joe Belmont on guitar, Rudi Weeks on Bass, Jon Weeks on woodwinds, Jeff Nissenbaum and William Cumpiano on percussion.

THURSDAY

The New Horizons Band will be the backdrop to the First Week Reggae Dance from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. in the Student Union Ballroom.

FRIDAY

Comedienne Lizz Winstead will reign in the Student Union Ballroom at 8 p.m. Winstead has performed on MTV's Half Hour Comedy Hour, the Evening at the Improv, HBO's Women of the Night and a PBS special with Whoopi Goldberg.

Described as "ascerbically goofy," she attacks all issues from the political to the physical (fitness, that is). She has appeared with the Replacements and Jay Leno.

A veteran of the college circuit, she's known for her on-target one liners such as "I studied philosophy in college — I think, therefore I'm single."

If Lizz Winstead isn't what you need, how about The Hand That Rocks the Cradle, which will be shown in the Campus Center Auditorium at 7, 9 and 11 p.m.

And for those of you that can't sit still long enough to be entertained or scared, why don't you get "rocked" in the Bluewall at 9 p.m.

The featured bands include Hypnotic Clambake and 3rd Estate. Clambake, described by the Village Voice as "way-electric Boston-based spoofenanny ripping a psychoklezmatic swath across the sacred folk sounds of many nations," is apparently worth the trip to the place that makes the best coffee and sugar cookies in the universe, The Bluewall. Their album Square Dance Messiah has some rich slices such as "Rasta Cyborg," "The Feldmans" and "Ozone."

A seven-member band, 3rd Estate calls its sound "world soul music," and the Boston Globe has named their inspiration to be "Parliament-Funkadelic" with "twisted wit and a bright horn attack." It's a band with a global beat and local spunk and personality. Want to give them a spin before you see them in person? Pick up 3rd Estate's debut disc Jamnation.

All programs for First Week 92, beginning on Tuesday and ending Friday, have a one-time admission charge of $3. The ticket is good for the entire week. Welcome back!

Amherst bar exam

Collegian reporters get scoop on suds

By TIM TURPIN
and DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Have you ever wondered what it's like on the other side of the bar at a crowded uptown establishment? The Collegian decided to find out. Employees of several local bars helped shed some light about life on the "other side."

Q: What is the worst fake ID you have ever seen?

A: Carrie Green, senior political science major at Amherst College and waitress at Delano's: "I saw one ID which was about 3 inches by 5 inches. It was ridiculous. Sometimes two people use the same ID when they sit next to each other. They just slip it to each other."

Kim Bressen, 1992 graduate of UMass, and waitress at Delano's: "I saw a fake out-of-state license that was almost shredded, and the woman was a brunette but the picture on the ID was of a blond women. It wasn't even close."

Chris Paquette, senior fine arts major at UMass and waitress at The Pub: "This summer an incoming freshman up for orientation came in and ordered a mixed drink from another waitress. His ID was terrible. It didn't even have a state on it. So we served him a virgin drink without him knowing. He drank it and left, thinking he was cool because his ID worked in Amherst, but that thing would never work in this town."

Andy Smith, doorman at Time Out: "There was this one girl who was about 4-foot-5 and her ID said she was 6 feet tall. Sometimes kids come in with a license that says they were born in 1963 or they come with a birth certificate and expect to get in. They will try anything to get in."

Q: How can you tell the difference between a UMass student and an Amherst College student?

A: Paquette: "UMass students don't tip as well."

Green: "UMass students tip better."

Bressen: "Amherst students usually pay with credit cards. They are more demanding and they know what good service is. If something is served the wrong way you get in trouble."

Bruno Matarazzo, owner of Antonio's Pizza: "UMass students are a bit more down to earth. They create more conversation and give you a tip. They joke around, ask how business is doing and shoot the breeze."

Smith: "UMass kids wear sweatshirts and hats while the Amherst students dress up more."

Q: What is the worst pick-up line you have ever heard?

A: Green: "This guy came up to me and said he knew me. He said a year and a half ago I tried to pick him up but that he was with someone then. He said however now he was free. I had never even seen the guy before, let alone try to pick him up."

Bressen:" They usually say, 'Hey, do you work here?' or 'You are my favorite waitress.' Sometimes businessmen who come in here try to buy me a drink, and ask the manager if it's all right if I drink at work."

Smith:"Underage girls will try to flirt with you just to get into the bar."

Q: What is the strangest thing you have ever seen happen while at work?

A:Matarazzo:"This drunk guy had a slice of pizza in each hand and he was putting one slice in his mouth and the other in his ear. He was getting pizza all over his head and in his hair."

Green: "We had a guy pass out on his 21st birthday. On Sundays, when Sede and the Accoustical Wave play sometimes guys will just run right up and start singing with her."

Smith: "One night four guys took the seat covers off of the bar stools and ran around the bar wearing them as hats."

Looking to be offended, it's a Thrill

My Life With the Thrill Kill Kult
Interscope

Originally intended to be a movie project in the tradition of the Monkees and The Commitments, My Life with the Thrill Kill Kult has grown from the duo of singer/poet Groovie Mann and keyboardist/producer Buzz McCoy to a six-member leather extravaganza.

In the fall of 1987 McCoy and Mann began to "spawn their creation." The response to their first soundtrack for the intended movie, released early on Chicago's Wax Trax label, was so overwhelming that the duo shelved the film idea and went straight to another album, I See Good Spirits and I See Bad Spirits.

A full band was then put together with the back-up vocalists known as the Bomb Gang Girlz (led by the notorious Jacky Blacque whose many talents include vocals and "go-go butt," according to their official press release). Secret Dame and Kitty Killdare are also on vocals.

With this latest release, the group decided to take a different edge to their music. For instance, using glitz and glam for a more Vegas-style "Cabaret from Hell" feel, according to their label, Interscope Records.

This new album is full of disco and grunge, sex and decadence — which the Kult refers to as "tabloid rock."

For the listener this means being perpetually offended by lyrics like "Journey to bondage/ fall prey to the whip/ goddess of mayhem/ the lust mistress trip." This clip pulled from the "Continental Touch' song has all the right ingredients to incur Tipper Gore's wrath. (Remember the PMRC.)

The Kult tries to cover up the offensive lyrics they call music with their slick production, but nothing's going to hide the fact that this is a scary bunch of minds.

What if they did make a movie? What kind of a rating would it get? Even the most open-minded people will have trouble swallowing this as being great musicianship.

What the Kult does do well is re-create the formula for good dance music, but beyond that the woman clad in black clutching a whip on the inside of the cassette cover and the other scantily clad individuals glaring with ferocity add nothing to their music.

"We like to take everything, blow it out of proportion, distort and regurgitate it and throw it back to the world — not unlike the tabloids," explains Buzz.

The Kult's distorted view of women, who are objectified and degraded on the cover and inserts, makes it no surprise that this summer the Kult released their new remix of "Sex on Wheelz" to be the lead single for the animated Paramount movie Cool World which starred Kim Basinger.

"Sex on Wheelz" is heavier rock than the rest of this masochistic mush, but it isn't loud enough to drown out Groovie Mann's growling, "Be my little human sacrifice/do my kisses burn/ do they take your breath/ you've got a lesson to learn now/ I'm the kiss of death."

Buzz and Groovie along with the help of Kult member Kaptain Dave still maintain their visual side (while away from the filming) by producing all their own album covers and graphics. The film My Life with the Thrill Kill Kult is still "on hold," but the band is planning to be on tour this fall and their next album will be released early in '93.

The Kult overstep the boundaries between fine line between Madonna and masochism, and their music simply isn't good enough to look past their sleazy imagery. After all, "total sensory overload" is what they're about.

'Honeymoon In Vegas' is the King

By TIM TURPIN
and DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

"Wise men say/only fools rush in," was the advice sung by the Chineselvis impersonator to Jack Singer (Nicholas Cage) when he decided to borrow $65,000 from Tommy Corman (James Caan). Singer went on to lose the poker game and his fiancee Betsy (Sarah Jessica Parker) to Corman.

With this, Honeymoon In Vegas takes a turn for the zany. What results is a madcap adventure which leads Singer from his quiet life as a private investigator to a member of the Utah chapter of the "Flyin' Elvises" in order to regain Betsy's love.

To backtrack, Singer, who suffers from an Oedipal complex, is terrified of marriage, despite his deep love for fair Betsy. After a few years of courting, Betsy issues an ultimatum to Singer: marry her or lose her. Singer complies and the next day they nervously set out for Las Vegas.

In the hotel lobby, Corman, a professional poker player, sees Betsy and is reminded of his late wife. He vows to win Betsy's love at any cost and he quickly suckers Singer into a poker game.

The game, which includes former University of Nevada at Las Vegas basketball coach Jerry Tarkanian and the Chinese Elvis impersonator, quickly becomes a high stakes match. When Singer finds himself $65,000 in debt, Corman offers Singer a choice: let Corman spend the weekend with Betsy or come up with the money.

After much deliberation, the strapped-for-cash couple reluctantly agree Betsy will spend the weekend with Corman. And so, off we go.

This is where the movie takes off. As Corman and Betsy fly to Hawaii, Jack realizes his error and does all he can to find them. Cage plays the role of a depressed lover quite well. His ability to look like a regular guy down on his luck makes him the perfect choice for the role. His knack of using the craziest facial expressions often left the audience in hysterics.

Parker is terrific as Betsy. Her beauty and grace compliment the gorgeous Hawaian landscape. Watching her play the role, it is easy to realize why both men are willing to do nearly anything to gain her affection. Simply put, most men would be willing to skydive for her.

Caan is strong in his role as the dirty gambler trying to steal Betsy away from the hero. His wardrobe is a little cheezy, but overall he does a fine job.

What this movie will most be remembered for is the 34 "Flyin' Elvises" who give Singer a ride to Vegas that he won't forget.

This definitely is the funniest scene in the movie. Picture a few dozen skydivers, dressed in white leather, bell-bottomed jumpsuits outlined with Christmas tree lights with sequined fringe, circling above the Las Vegas skyline. Their outfits could not have been more flamboyant had they used "The Bedazzler."

The ending is quick and not too much mushy, leaving the movie-goer still on the high of the skydiving scene.

The soundtrack for the movie features current artists playing Elvis classics, including Billy Joel, Ricky Van Shelton and Bruce Springsteen, among others. Springsteen's rendition of the King's "Viva Las Vegas" was our personal favorite.

Honeymoon In Vegas is an uproarious and irresistable comedy that hits the jackpot.

Elfquest: adult comics?

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Because the Elfquest comic book series is in its 15th year, its publisher Warp Graphics believes it now has enough of a following to secure a foothold in the college scene.

The publishers assert, "Elfquest is one of the only comics that appeals to men and women equally." They maintain that the American Library Association has called Elfquest "One of the most important works in American fantasy." So will that make the Elfquest comics as widely read as the Collegian? (After all, they don't have horoscopes.)

Elfquest's creators, Wendy and Richard Pini, released their first collector's issue this summer with the newest Elfquest series — Elfquest: Hidden Years. These comics will then be "recycled" — collected and reprinted — into larger graphic novels. (There are currently eight volumes in the Elfquest Graphic Novel collection.

Comic books are not "just for kids" anymore. With adult cartoons coming out in the movie theaters (Cool World), adult comics books are also garnering more media attention. Some adult comics are packed with stories of adventure and triumph, some feature romance and lighthearted humor, and some are full of spirituality and the ongoing search for truth. The creators like to think Elfquest combines all of these elements.

Elfquest emerged in 1978 through Wendy Pini, a self-trained artist, and her husband Richard, who handles the writing and business. It has since evolved into a series of eight colorized graphic novels which have sold more than one million copies in the Unites States alone. Elfquest has been adapted into a music album, and is the focus of a course in the African American Studies department at the State University of New York at Buffalo titled "Elfquest: An excursion in Contemporary Myth," according to the publishers.

If you're among those who think elves must be cute, Elfquest will shock you — Elfquest's "fantasy-with-teeth" formula offers its readers everything from hard-core battle to exploration of the soul (the soul of elves, that is).

These comics are not to be read while eating. Considerable blood and guts spew off every other page. The rest of the pages bulge with heroism, adventure and busty babes.

There are subscriptions available according to the book's small print (which I found more entertaining than some of the storyline). Subscriptions are $20 for six issues, but the publisher urges "We offer subscriptions as a last resort service. You should really bug your comic shop retailer to keep a supply of Elfquest comics in stock; it's cheaper and faster than a subscription."

This issue entitled Wolfwood was my first journey into comics. Would I recommend this to you? Depends on whether you're the Dungeons and Dragons type. It's a quick read. It's a little fun before you crash out asleep; the only trying part is managing to keep track of the characters' kooky names.

I hope that UMass students want to be challenged with something a little deeper than this, but if you are already a comic book fan, Elfquest is a must read/flip.

"Is it worth the two bucks?" is what all the hype comes down to, isn't it? It does have fabulous graphics. The charming characters endear you with their huge eyes and pointy little ears, the frames flow so fast it's almost like MTV and the text is cryptic — like your horoscope.

Mr. Lupo reviews summer movie letdowns

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Nuns crooning Motown. . . a curvaceous cat. . . an okay supporting performance by Madonna — this has been one of the strangest summers for movies. Some were good, many were average and most were, well, let's just say they made staying home and watching reruns of "Rescue 911" a viable alternative.

Okay — so it wasn't that bad, but it was not exactly spectacular. Over-hyped and ego-inflated projects fizzled (so Batman Returns only made a half a zillion dollars) while smaller, star-driven films scored. And in between my alternate career as a grocery check-out guy, I managed to see just about all of them (and I hit every bargain matinee I could find). So, here goes: the good, the average and the ugly.

Let me dispense with the blockbusters and wannabes. Batman Returns (B-) was in many ways better and worse than the first. This one boasted a sleeker production design and an even more thread-bare plot. Michael Keaton once again played second banana to the villains: Danny DeVito's annoying penguin, Christopher Walken's virtual replay of his A View to a Kill villain and Michelle Pfeiffer's slinky, sexy, superb Catwoman. Talk about "schwing!"

Harrison Ford replaced Alec Baldwin (quite well) in Patriot Games (B-), a pretty good action flick that could have used more of the intricate techno stuff Tom Clancy thrillers are known for.

There was an early summer score for Mel Gibson and Danny Glover in the "who cares about plot let's just shoot some more people and make wisecracks about it" hit Lethal Weapon 3 (C+). I had fun, but where was the solid story and coherent action from the first two?

I'm giving Alien 3 (B-) the benefit of the doubt. I think I know what director David Fincher was trying to do — that is, make a sorrowful end-of-the-world thriller with a subtext. However this doesn't actually make for exciting action. It's easy to see where the concessions were made with his concept of art and the studio's concept of commerce in the film, so give it another chance on video.

The final summer wannabes include Ron Howard's smoothly whitewashed immigrant saga Far and Away (C+). Good performances by Tom Cruise and Nicole Kidman, but it was too old-fashioned for its own good.

Stunning special effects couldn't save Death Becomes Her (C+) from being as empty as the hole in Goldie Hawn's chest.

Eddie Murphy tried to make a comeback in the classiest looking comedy of the summer with the filthiest mouth, Boomerang (C+). Robin Givens is a fantastic match for Murphy, but when he falls for the cute and nice Halle Berry, the film loses its edge and becomes a redemption farce with Murphy trying to be Mr. Sensitive Man of the Nineties (not!).

A little better was the body-switching romance Prelude to a Kiss (B), a sweet and sensitive film that featured good chemistry and performances by Alec Baldwin and Meg Ryan.

Melanie Griffith went undercover again in A Stranger Among Us (C-), this time as a Hasidic Jew ('nuff said).

Monumental wastes of time and money include the supremely forgettable Encino Man (D-), the almost offensively inane Unlawful Entry (D+), Ralph Bakshi's major, major misstep Cool World (D-) the truly sad Man Trouble (D-) and the so-cheesy-it's-campy Whispers in the Dark (D). The last ten minutes of this supposed thriller were perhaps the funniest scenes of the whole summer.

Immeasurably better were great films like A Midnight Clear (A-), a definite sleeper that told the stroy of five disillusioned WWII soldiers with originality and constant tension. Impeccable performances by Emma Thomson, Anthony Hopkins, Helena Bonham Carter and Vanessa Redgrave made Howards End (A) easily the best of the films from the Merchant-Ivory production team and Edwardian novelist E.M. Forster. This very accessible art-house hit is also by far one of the best films of the year.

Director Robert Altman returned with a vengeance in his wickedly funny, sly and satirical take on the movie biz, The Player (A). Tim Robbins, a host of star cameos and a killer script make this the must-see flick this year.

Brian De Palma also made a return of sorts with the ingeniously cheesy Raising Cain (B+). By filling this intentionally campy thriller with piles of film references, from Hitchcock to his own movies, and by amplifying what many people hate about his movies, the "shot before the plot" director joyously made fun of himself.

Finally in the cases of both Sister Act (C) and A League of Their Own (C) I think I was the only person who thought these two movies weren't very good. Sister Act, the latest "fish out of water" movie with the brain of a sitcom only left me wondering why Whoopi Goldberg, Maggie Smith and Harvey Keitel were slumming with this flat material. Yes, the singing nuns were cute, but their funny scenes were surrounded by about ninety minutes of the worst, most predictable comedy I've seen in a while.

League wasn't that much better. A disjointed, drippy and overly sentimental movie that contained a great premise yet unfortunately drowned it with scenes designed to yank (not tug) at your heart strings and about a jillion baseball montages that substituted for dramatic tension. Was it me, or could you have jumbled up the quick, throwaway scenes (more like excuses for a punchline) and placed them in just about any order? Geena Davis, Tom Hanks and Jon Lovitz turned in good performances but they're hard to see through the surprisingly manipulative direction by Penny Marshall.

In retrospect, I wasted a lot of money, ate too much popcorn and all I have to show for it are my bloodshot eyes (I like to sit in the fourth row). The thought of doing it all again next summer? . . . I can't wait.

Mr. Lupo says SWF is a by-the-book bore

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

SWMC seeks thriller that's utterly predictable. Must have tired formula. Non-scary preferred. Some decent acting allowed.

Looks like I've found what I'm looking for in Single White Female, the latest in a string of "insider" thrillers like Pacific Heights and Unlawful Entry. This time the "perfect roommate" gets the nightmare treatment.

Normally classy director Barbet Schroeder (Reversal of Fortune) goes Hollywood in this painfully predictable, by-the-book bore. Not even respectable performances by Jennifer Jason Leigh and Bridget Fonda can rescue Single White Female from the insipidness of the genre.

Single White Female, from the 1990 John Lutz novel SWF Seeks Same, begins the formula with Allie Jones (Fonda), a twentysomething career woman who throws out her fiancee (Steven Weber of Wings) for cheating on her with his ex-wife. Allie begins to feel lonely, leading her to advertise for a roommate to share her oversized, rent-controlled New York City loft.

Her SWF is Hedra Carlson (Leigh), a mousy social misfit who, despite being peculiar initially, bonds with Allie so that she is welcomed with almost conspicuously open arms. Does Allie check her references? No. She trusts her. Didn't she see The Hand that Rocks the Cradle? Doesn't she know what not checking references can lead to? Of course not — that would take common sense, or at least a trip to the movies once in a while.

But if everyone behaved like they had a clue then naturally there would be no movie. So as soon as you can say "I've seen all of this before," Hedra starts erasing messages, buying a destined-to-be-doomed cute puppy, eyeing the now-returned fiancee and changing her hair to match Allie's. Is anyone truly surprised by this?

By the time the bodies start piling up and Allie starts waking up, it's too late: it's time for the obligatory, violent chase climax, complete with tense music, close calls and a body that just won't stay dead.

Schroeder tries to deepen the tired material with apparent riffs on Bergman's Persona but just ends up with some dead-twin-fear-of-abandonment-psychobabble. Single White Female is nicely made, but people don't see movies for production value anymore. The fiancee, Allie's sleazy boss and an upstairs neighbor all seem less like supporting players and more like convenient victims (although there is an inspired use of a five-inch stiletto heel that is quite funny).

The two good things about Single White Female are its protagonists. Both create slightly more sharpened characters than you'd expect. The talents of both Jennifer Jason Leigh (Rush) and Bridget Fonda (Doc Hollywood) are above this shoddy formula.

Leigh's Hedra hides under the guise of being "giving," but the material makes her transformation from dowdy wallflower to standard psycho too quick. Leigh's best work (in Last Exit to Brooklyn and Rush) allowed her more time and room to work with. Here, she must catch up with the churning plot.

Bridget Fonda, at first glance, isn't very good here. Her airy voice and awkward motions recall the "acting" style of Melanie Griffith. But it's Allie Jones we see on screen, not someone trying to be ordinary. Just like Leigh's Hedra however, Fonda must become victim, then avenger. It's so predictable it doesn't even approach believable.

And finally, Single White Female isn't even that scary. While the climax has some suspenseful moments, it's just business as usual. . . which is precisely the problem with these types of films.

Hedy (Jennifer Jason Leigh) feels betrayed by her roommate, to whom she has become obsessively attached, in the psychological thriller 'Single White Female.'

Background info on Single White Female

Genesis:

John Lutz's mystery novel, SWF Seeks Same, published in 1990 by St. Martin's Press.

"I noticed the urban scene becoming more dangerous, the economy causing people to take roommates," says the author. "It occurred to me they didn't do a lot of research about the people whom they allowed into their homes and their lives."

Though Lutz resides in St. Louis, he set the story in Manhattan because "it is the quintessential urban setting; its problems are a portent of what will happen in other cities."

Research:

Leigh read the work of psychoanalysts Melanie Klien and Alice Miller about the "Dyadic conflict" — an individual's feeling of being incomplete unless intertwined with someone else.

Among the films director Barbet Schroeder invokes as inspiration and precedent are Ingmar Bergman's 1966 film, Persona, and Roman Polanski's Rosemary's Baby, released in 1968.

Production and Direction

Schroeder, who in 1990 garnered praise and an Academy Award nomination for his striking and literate Reversal of Fortune, relishes the ironies of dramatic situations.

Schroeder considers Single White Female a "tale of completion, a kind of modern fairy tale. Allie learns to be alone, to be a real person."

Barbet Schroeder assembled an exceptionally-credentialed group of collaborators for Single White Female, which was shot in Los Angeles and New York during the summer of 1991.

The editing was entrusted to Lee Percy, A.C.E., who also cut Reversal of Fortune. Howard Shore, who punctuated The Silence of the Lambs, wrote the score.

Summing up the relationship between the film's visuals and its theme, Schroeder says, "The situation which Single White Female presents — one woman obsessively trying to become another — plays into the core of the moviegoing experience, requiring viewers to identify or 'merge' with whomever they are watching."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE

By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Proceed with confidence, arm-in-arm with that special someone who shares everything with you. Allowing others to interfere could cause a fiasco. Add some razzel-dazzel to an artistic project.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You have a chance to quell the forces of disruption. Use common sense and remain true to your high ideals. Handle a public relations project with care. Maintain a flexible mind-set.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Look into the possibility of acquiring a valuable piece of property. A shrewd approach could get you a real bargain. In most cases, intellect wins out over brawn.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Make certain your projected moves have been approved in advance by key associates. They could get cold feet later on. Learn more about real scientific advances as well as healing arts.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Pour on the charm and you will be able to get more milage out of a profitable monetary trend. Talking shop could prove quite stimulating this evening.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Play a helpful at work, giving special attention to routine chores and complicated tasks. Reorganize your financial affairs. A timely investment will aid your efforts to help the needy.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Taking advantage of good luck may help you realize wonderful domestic benefits. You acquire something you have long needed. Count on the pace of your social life to accelerate.

SCORPIO (Oct. 2-Nov. 21): Someone's suggestions and complaints are valid; listen closely and do some research. You can save a lot of money by becoming a comparison shopper.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): If paperwork continues to mount, do something about it. Seek an expert's help if necessary. Pay more attention to your partners emotional needs.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Sharpen your communication skills. Learn to delegate routine duties to other people while you attend top-priority matters personally. If single, play the field in romance.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A carefree attitude prevails this morning. Get to know the people you work with better; productivity will rise. Community or church projects appeal to seniors.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Flexibility is needed today. Try to get a better handle on your needs. Even if others oppose you, you are likely to prevail. Speak up so that people will know how you feel.

Minutewomen take experience into season

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

If you ask University of Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy to describe his feelings about his 1992 squad, he smiles and dishes out phrases such as "guardedly optimistic" and "cautiously excited."

However, after looking at his team, at least on paper, it is obvious that only Rudy's experience as a coach is keeping his excitement for the upcoming season in check.

Simply, the Minutewomen, who last season were ranked as high as 7th nationally en route to a 14-5 record and yet another NCAA tournament appearance, return ten starters, will be helped by a solid freshman class and could be stronger at every position from 1991. Massachusetts is ranked No. 9 in the preseason poll.

"We will be better than last year," said senior defenseman Holly Hellmuth, a first team All-American selection last season. "We have better depth, great freshman and our key players are more experienced. We are all set."

In Hellmuth, a two-time Hermann Trophy (Most Valuable Player in the country) finalist, Rudy may have the finest women's collegiate soccer player in the nation. Hellmuth, a stifling defender, also led the team is scoring last season with 8 goals.

"With Holly, I know that over the course of the year she may very well shut out every person she faces. She is like Dennis Eckersley — there won't be more than one or two blown plays all season. And on offense, you know she is going to do some damage."

Hellmuth may grab the headlines but her fellow defensemen form a talented unit which allowed only nine goals last season. Seniors Lisa Mickelson and Carrie Koeper and sophomore Heidi Kocher are all returning starters from last year's campaign.

"Our defense has all four starters back and that is a nice feeling," said Rudy. "And at this point they are all playing strong defense while trying to attack, which is new for them."

In 1991, finishing the attack was the Minutewomen's chief weakness. Massachusetts routinely had trouble finding the net but with three starters returning and the presence of freshman Nicole Roberts, Rudy is optimistic.

Roberts, a Troy, N.Y. native, netted 65 goals in her senior year of high school while being named New York State Section 2 Player of the Year. She is considered a speed player with a tremendous shot, according to recruiting reports.

Defensemen Holly Hellmuth and the UMass women's soccer team are looking for a big season. Hellmuth is an All-American and is a candidate for this season's Hermann Award.

"[Roberts] can really stick it in the net," Rudy said. "She is my type of player, a great talent who also has great training intensity. She'll be an impact player this season."

Roberts will look to join senior Kim Eynard (5 goals last season), junior Colleen Milliken (4 goals) and sophomore Polly Hackathorn (3 goals) on the UMass front line.

At midfield, Rudy will return two starters, juniors Paula Wilkins and Amy Trunk. Wilkins, a strong two-way player, battled injuries all year to record three goals and six assists.

In net Rudy will have to choose a starter from two of the region's finest keepers, Briana Scurry and Skye Eddy. Last season, with Eddy on the sidelines due to injuries, the duties fell to Scurry, who responded brilliantly by recording 12 shutouts and a 0.47 goals against average.

However, with the equally talented Eddy back, Rudy is faced with a difficult decision.

"It is the toughest decision I have had to make in years," Rudy said. "There will be a definite starter. Splitting the time 50-50 doesn't work. Right now they are even, I am not leaning one way or the other. The training sessions have become a highlight film, with one outdoing the other and vice-versa."

No matter which player is selected, Rudy does realize his team will be facing some pressure to succeed.

"Expectations may be high, but I do not concern myself with that," he said. "We have a good blend of old and new, but our rivals (Connecticut, University of Hartford) have also done well, so we will see what happens."

Wilkins, who along with Hellmuth make up the on-field captains, said, "We need to take it one game at a time and concentrate on short term goals. We can not afford to look past anyone on our schedule like we did last year."

One game at a time is just how Wilkins' cautiously optimistic coach would like his team to take it.

Wong looking to stabilize athletic department

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

After six months of turmoil and the loss of two key administrators, the University of Massachusetts athletic department is looking for a stabilizing force. They may have found such a man in interim Athletic Director Glenn Wong.

After the retirement of Athletic Director Frank McInerney on May 4, and the reassignment and eventual resignation of former Dean of Physical Education David Bischoff, the two top positions in the athletic department were left unfilled.

In addition, the ongoing investigation by the House Post Audit and Oversight Committee has brought a lot of negative publicity on the department. Recently, Chancellor Richard O'Brien has taken matters concerning athletics into his own hands and has appointed Wong to oversee the department.

Wong was appointed acting Dean of Physical Education on July 20, but when it became apparent that the search for a new athletic director would not be completed in time for the fall sports season, Wong was moved and named interim AD. Provost Glen Gordon will take over at the School of Phys Ed for Wong until a permanent AD is found, at which point Wong will become permanent Dean.

Wong said he hopes to move the department and university forward as interim AD, looking to focus on the positive aspects of the sports program.

"One of the things that's lost sight of is how successful a lot of the athletic departments are," said Wong. "I think the focus recently has been on some of the negatives, and, to some extent, we've lost sight of the positives.

"I think it's the University's opinion that there were some serious allegations made," Wong said. "But I don't think any conclusions should be drawn until the process is completed and the people who were accused have had an opportunity to respond to the allegations."

Wong has been subpoenaed by the House Post Audit and Oversight committee, but has not yet testified before the group. He said he has no idea when the public hearings will reconvene.

In addition to keeping the department afloat, Wong must also help look for a permanent AD. As a member of the search committee for the next athletic director, he has some influence in picking his successor.

"It's taken a little longer to fill the AD

Which University of Massachusetts field hockey team will take the field at 7 p.m. tonight against Boston College? The team that started last year 8-0 en route to a No. 2 national ranking, or the team that went 6-7-1 in the second half and had trouble beating anyone? The team that came within a whisker of upsetting national champion Old Dominion or a team that lost to Northeastern?

Nobody knows for sure, but coach Pam Hixon is hoping for the best.

"Last year was a rebuilding year, and I was just as surprised as anyone else to see that we were 8-0," Hixon said. "We fell off [that pace] in the second half of the season, but I think we gained momentum in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

"We were disappointed that we didn't go further, but we ended last season on a note that left the team hungry for the upcoming year," she said.

Gone are A-10 Player-of-the-Year Sherlan Cabralis and forward Dawn Trumbauer, who were the heart and soul of last year's squad. Trumbauer was the team's most reliable scorer while Cabralis was a superb passer and defender. Despite the duo's departure, UMass has still landed a pre-season No. 7 national ranking.

Former assistants Heather Lewis and Kathy DeAngelis have left to pursue head coaching jobs. Lewis is the women's lacrosse and field hockey coach at Bucknell, and DeAngelis took the head field hockey position at LaSalle.

Taking over as assistants are Amy Robertson, a former UMass field hockey player, and Karen Marley, who is on sabbatical from a Pennsylvania high school.

Defense remains the strong suit for the Minutewomen, who return their entire defense, which was one of the best in the country. The backfield consists of seniors Joy Blenis, Kathy Phelan and Sherri Dorion and junior sweeper Tracy Barclay.

In addition, UMass' goaltending situation will be solid regardless of who gets the starting nod. Senior Philippa Scott is the incumbent, coming off a year in which she made the Atlantic-10 All Conference and All-Tournament teams and allowed only 116 goals last year. Senior Tina Rusiecki is also competing for the position, and she would be the starter on many other teams.

"It's too early to tell [who the starter is]," Hixon said. "[Scott] has handled most of the practices because Tina is recovering from surgery."

The offense remains the question mark on this UMass team, which struggled through last year with an ineffective penalty corner. The penalty corner is the most potent and effective means of scoring, yet the Minutewomen had trouble with it.

Bringing offensive firepower with them are junior forwards Jenn Salisbury and Tara Jelley, and sophomore midfielders Holly Hockenbrock and Colleen Duffy. The four players have had a full year to gel with one another and can only improve.

"I think [defense] is our strength," Hixon said. "I think we're big and strong on defense."

The Minutewomen have one of their most difficult schedules ever, facing teams on the road such as Old Dominion, Virginia, Boston College and Providence. In addition, they play North Carolina and Stanford and also must face all three A-10 opponents, Temple, Rutgers and Rhode Island on the road.

In addition to the returners, Hixon noted two newcomers who could contribute immediately, Natalie Hart and Ainslee Press.

"Ainslee is a terrific addition to our midfield. She was an alternate to the Canadian Olympic team, and I'm excited she's finishing her eligibility with us," said Hixon. "She's an excellent player.

"Natalie is a transfer from England with three years of eligibility left, and she'll play in the backfield," Hixon said.

Starting QB slot up in the air

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

Even with all the controversy and change that shook the UMass football community over the past six months, one thing that hasn't changed since last season is the quarterback situation.

Much like last year, when four signal callers took turns playing musical quarterback under Jim Reid, this year looks to be much the same, with "starting quarterback" being a week-to-week title rather than a season long one.

With Tom Fasano, Dave McGovern, Paul Tornatore, and Tony Williams splitting the QB duties last season, UMass sputtered to a 4-7 record, while finishing last in the Yankee Conference in passing offense.

Springtime came and went as did McGovern and Tornatore, McGovern choosing not to re-enroll, Tornatore a graduating senior. When the coaching staff decided to move Williams to defensive back to better utilize his athletic ability, the job appeared to belong to Fasano, the senior from Bergenfield, NJ.

Fasano, who started one game for the Minutemen last season completing 21 of 37 passes for one touchdown and three interceptions, had suddenly jumped two spots to the top of the UMass depth chart, and the job appeared to be his for the time being.

But Andrew McNeilly, a redshirt freshmen from Melrose, MA caught the eye of the coaching staff with his strength and athletic ability during spring drills, and vaulted into a virtual dead heat with Fasano for the starting job.

Throw in Jason Tudryn, another redshirt freshmen from Northampton and Clark Ramos, a sophomore who was moved back to QB after being moved to strong safety last year, and the scene starts to look much like the quarterback by committee of the year before.

"If anything, we've complicated the mix," head coach Mike Hodges said. "We moved Clark Ramos back to QB, then you throw in Jason Tudryn and we're just going to have to let the scrimmages sort things out. The final decision will probably be made the Monday before the Delaware game."

A definite decision has not been made, but early reports have McNeilly holding a slight edge over Fasano, with Tudryn and Ramos battling for the third spot.

The Minutemen have had QB trouble ever since the injury to Gary Wilkos, who suffered a fractured vertabrae during a game in the fall of 1990. Since then, the team has tried a plethora of signal-callers. The Minutemen finished last in passing offense last year, behind Delaware, which runs a version of the wishbone.

Minutemen looking to make noise on the field

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

When the 1991 University of Massachusetts football season ended on the muddied field of Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium with a 35-28 loss to the University of New Hampshire, many thought that 1992 might be a rebuilding year for the 4-7 Minutemen.

The 1992 edition of UMass football would have to make do without Jerome Bledsoe, the leading ground gainer in Division 1-AA, as well as bookend offensive tackles Rich Cavanaugh and Kai Dietiker. Defensively, gaping holes were left where All-Yankee Conference defensive tackle Rich Kane and All-YanCon linebacker Matt Tulley once stood.

But on February 13, the Minutemen were left to fill their biggest hole as head coach Jim Reid became former head coach Jim Reid, resigning after learning the football budget would be cut by more than $100,000. With spring practice less than two months away, the Minutemen were without their leader, but worse than that, without a feeling of where the football program at UMass stood.

Spring practice went on as planned, with then defensive coordinator Mike Hodges and offensive coordinator Doug Berry handling the day to day duties of running the team as UMass began a nationwide search for Reid's replacement.

That search ended on April 23, when Hodges took over as the 23rd head football coach in UMass history, thus beginning a new chapter in the 110-year tradition of UMass football.

Hodges first priority was to "get on the phone, start mailing letters and let people know we're alive." Second priority was to retool a Minuteman team that had lost almost half of its starters from 1991.

The biggest question, the same question that plagued the team in 1991, of course is who will run the Minuteman offense, and better yet who will be successful doing it.

Coming out of spring practice, it appeared the cards were in favor of Tom Fasano, a senior who started one game for the Minutemen last year. But as things stand now it appears that redshirt freshman Andrew McNeilly may be the signal caller when the Minutemen line up against Delaware on September 12.

In the backfield, junior tailback John Johnson, after playing understudy to Bledsoe last year, looks to return to 1990 from when he rushed for 729 yards while being named YanCon Rookie-of-the Year.

Joining Johnson in the backfield will be junior fullback Mike George, who rushed for 509 yards last year while teaming with Bledsoe to form one of leagues most potent backfields.

While it appears the Minutemen will be doing most of their yardage-gaining on the ground, they do display tremendous talent in the receiving corps where 5'5" flanker Eric Thimas returns for his third season with the Minutemen after leading UMass with 16.7 yards per catch last year.

With last year's leading receiver Lamar Newsome gone with graduation, the Minutemen will look to sophomores Matt Read and Peter Cutone to fill the bill at Split End, with redshirt freshmen Aidan Gaffney and Celso King also expected to battle for playing time.

Replacing a tight end like Ron Villone isn't always easy, but Hodges feels confident that Steve Dembowski, a junior from Swampscott, MA, can step right in and fill the void left by Villone's departure for the U.S. Olympic baseball team and an impending professional career.

The offensive line, although seemingly weakened by the losses of Cavanaugh and Dietiker, may be one of the strongest aspects of the 1992 Minutemen. UMass sports two of the best guards in the YanCon in Co-Captain Bill Durkin and second year starter Phil Hallard, while Andy Rice and Joe Sabella appear to have the inside track for the tackle positions.

Defensively, the strength of the Minutemen lies in their linebackers, where junior Scott Assencoa returns for his third year as a starter, and 1990 All YanCon outside linebacker Mario Perry returns to the playing field after sitting out all of 1991 with an ankle injury.

Look for Co-Captain John Creamer to anchor an inexperienced defensive line that should also feature Brian Corcoran at the left tackle with Ben Albert and Silas Burke battling for time at the noseguard position.

Fifth year senior and 1991 All YanCon cornerback Don Caparotti leads the Minuteman secondary, which must cope with the loss of four-year starter Vaughn Williams. Look for Matt Rajotte, a hard-hitting junior who sat out the 1991 season with a bad back, to take over at the free safety position, while fifth year senior Allen Gibson looks to fill Williams' shoes at strong safety.

After playing quarterback in 1991, Tony Williams has moved back to the secondary and is expected to challenge Roxbury's Tim Lambright for the other corner position.

Water polo looking for NE title, NCAA berth

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Last year, the University of Massachusetts water polo team's season ended abruptly with a first-round loss in the Eastern Championships, a tournament which could have qualified the team for the NCAA Tournament. The team still finished 20th in the country with a 16-9 record, good enough to finish second in New England.

But this year's squad has higher hopes, and with a strong returning nucleus and the addition of a few key newcomers, head coach Russ Yarworth's team could be heading west this year for the NCAAs.

Preseason rankings have UMass fourth in the East, behind perennial powerhouse Slippery Rock, and Ivy leaguers Princeton and Brown. Somehow, some way, the Minutemen must jump to second in order to qualify for the NCAAs.

Co-captains Dan McOsker and Scott Reid lead a strong group of returning players looking to surprise some people. Driver Jay Peluso is also returning, and Yarworth thinks those three are key players.

"All three of those seniors play similar games," Yarworth said. "They're all drivers who can slash and get their shot off."

Yarworth said he hopes junior Tashan Engin, the team's hole or 2-meter man, can fulfill his vast potential. Engin's size (6-foot-6, 245) make him a natural for the position in front of the opposing team's goal.

Yarworth said the goaltending situation is up in the air, with Todd Houriham, Alexander Mujica and Paul Engen fighting for the starting job.

A last minute addition to the team who could have a positive effect on the team is Pepperdine transfer Jeremy Alters. Alters spent a year against the nation's toughest competition and should be a team leader.

"Last year we didn't do what we expected," Yarworth said, assessing this season's chances. "The team is definitely on a mission, and one goal is to make the NCAAs. Already the attitude of the squad is the best that I've ever seen."

Hoop team ready for biggest, brightest season

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

In addition to last season's 30-5 record and an advancement into the Sweet 16 of the NCAA Tournament, a few off-season developments may cement the University of Massachusetts basketball team into a perennial powerhouse.

Five nationally televised games, a beautiful new arena to play in, the recruitment of two blue-chip prospects and a non-conference schedule against some of the toughest teams in the nation might make this season even bigger and better for UMass.

In terms of television, this season's schedule will expose the Minutemen both regionally and nationally. UMass' season opener at Florida State December 2nd is on ESPN, as is their January 7th game against Cincinnati at Springfield, and the January 24th game against DePaul at the Worcester Centrum will be on ABC. The DePaul game will be the first time in history UMass will have appeared on ABC.

"Channel 25 (WFXT-Boston) and Channel 22 (WFSB-Springfield) are going to pick up seven weekend games," said coach John Calipari. "So all of New England will get to see seven or eight other games. Plus, we'll be on the A-10 network another three or four times.

"Our university needs more students," Calipari lamented. "How can we generate publicity for the University? One way is to get on television for basketball and have people see the University in a positive way."

The January 29th grand finale game at the Curry Hicks Cage will be televised nationally by ESPN. The midnight contest against the SW Louisiana Ragin' Cajuns will be a bittersweet day in UMass basketball history, as the Minutemen end one era and begin a new one.

The 9,296 seat William D. Mullins Convocation Center will be officially unveiled on February 4th against Atlantic 10 rival West Virginia, a game also on ESPN. Calipari said he is looking forward to its opening.

"The outside of the building is beautiful, but the inside of the building takes your breath away," Calipari said "It's going to be a showcase for the whole campus. When they televise it, you're going to talk about people around the country seeing a building that's second to none."

In terms of recruits, Calipari has landed the player he has sought for almost four years, Donta Bright, a 6-foot-6 slasher from Baltimore (MD) Dunbar High School. After the coaching staff had all but given up on the McDonald's high school All-American last spring, Bright decided at the last minute to attend UMass. Bright, considered the top talent on Dunbar's national championship team, chose Massachusetts over Ohio State and Clemson. That's the good news.

The bad news: Bright failed to pass the SATs or ACTs and is ineligible to play this season under NCAA rule Proposition 42. Bright will enroll at UMass and will sit out this season.

Dana Dingle, a 6-foot-6 forward from Bronx (NY) St. Raymond's, is the only recruit who could make an impact immediately.

"Dana's like one of the players that we have here that can play a number of positions," Calipari said. "You can't say that he's a this or a that — he's a player."

Also hoping to land a spot on the squad is former Springfield Central high school star, Giddell Padilla, who will be eligible after the fall semester. Padilla is technically a walk-on, and, like Bright, will not be able to work out with the team once practice starts November 1st.

Massachusetts will be on the road when it faces traditional rival Siena (Dec. 8). On Dec. 12, the Minutemen travel to Norman, OK, to face Oklahoma. January road dates include New Hampshire (Jan. 2) and Buffalo (Jan. 18).

In the Cage, the Minutemen take on Cental Connecticut (Dec. 5) and Boston University (Jan. 5). At the Abdow's Holiday Tournament in Springfield, UMass will face Holy Cross on Dec. 28 and either South Carolina or Alabama/Birmingham Dec. 29.

CHRISTOPHER EVANS / COLLEGIAN
The bad news is that Will Herndon won't be back for the basketball team this year. The good news is that the team will have a new arena, national TV exposure, and blue-chip prospects.

Cross country teams look to keep winning

•Women look for 2nd A-10 title

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

After finishing last season with a 4-3 record, collecting the school's first ever Atlantic 10 women's cross country championship and an A-10 Coach of the Year award for herself, Julie LaFreniere had good reason to be optimistic. Throw in the fact that only two seniors graduated, and the University of Massachusetts women's cross country coach is very optimistic of this year's squad.

Not only that, but LaFreniere's squad returns all but one of their top runners from last year's championship squad, while two more return from injuries that shelved them for most of last season.

"We lost Michelle [St. Laurent] and Cate [Dean], but we still have Mo [Maureen Meldrim] coming back after being out all last year with mononucleosis, and we have Kelly [Liljeblad] for the whole year this season," LaFreniere said.

Meldrim will tri-captain the Minutewomen along with Becky Johnson and Tricia Mathiesen. Throw in the Liljeblad twins (Kelly and Kim), and UMass should have one of the strongest front fives in the A-10.

Backing up the front five for the Minutewomen will be returnees Kerry Aker, Tracy DeLutis, and Julie Moreau, who finished second in the 10,000 meters at the A-10 Championships as a freshman.

With little loss, and eight solid runners back in top form, it appears that for LaFreniere and the rest of the Minutewomen back to back A-10 Championships may be within reach.

"I'd say that [winning the A-10's again] is a definite possibility if everyone stays healthy," LaFreniere said. "We've got almost everyone back, and some of the women who were freshmen last year have a whole year worth of experience under their belts."

Injuries plagued the Minutewomen in 1991, with both Kelly Liljeblad and Meldrim missing major portions of the season, while nagging injuries sidelined other team members for portions of the schedule.

"I think that as long as we can stay healthy we'll be okay," LaFreniere said. "If Kelly can stay healthy she has a real good shot at winning, [the A-10 individual championship] with two or three of her teammates right behind her."

•Men challenging for A-10s

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The best team you won't be seeing this fall is the University of Massachusetts men's cross country team, not because of their blazing speed but due to a schedule quirk.

"This year, we don't have home meets, but we had three last year," coach Ken O'Brien said. "We're in a sequence that happens every once in a while . . . When competing against three and four teams at a meet, we have to rotate the sites, and this year we don't host any meets."

O'Brien said he felt this year's team compares favorably to last year's squad, which compiled a 3-5 record and finished second to West Virginia in the Atlantic-10 Championships. While the roster is the same, most of the runners have had a year to gain championship meet experience.

"We lost four seniors going into 1991, so we were basically starting from scratch," O'Brien said. "This year, with six or seven runners, the shoe is on the other foot."

The team boasts three runners who consistently placed near the top of the pack in meets last year: seniors Matt Simon and Pat Reed and junior Craig Cormier.

"Matt was our first man last year, and I anticipate him to be the first man again. It's a toss-up between Pat and Craig for second man, but I look for those three to be our best runners again this season."

O'Brien said that this year's freshman crop will probably not step in and contribute to the team right away.

"You always hope for some major surprises from the freshman class, but the chances of that happening are less with most of our men returning," said O'Brien. "However, in the long haul, I think the freshman could contribute significantly."

Rounding out the team are runners Mike Davis, Kevin Greenhalgh, John Raach, Ben Winther, Thomas Walsh, Brian Fallon and Oliver Kardos.

UMass finished fifth in the New Englands last season, behind traditional powerhouses Providence College, Dartmouth College and Boston University. O'Brien hopes not only to move up in this year's New Englands, but to also capture the team's first A-10 Championship.

"West Virginia is not outside of our reach," O'Brien said. "It won't be any easier than it was last year. We'll be better but I expect them to be just as tough if not tougher."

Buoyed by donation, men's soccer team alive and kicking

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The good news is that the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team is back, thanks to a $1 million donation by UMass alumnus Jeff Ryan. The team played out its last season thinking it was the end of the road, only to have the program restored on April 1st.

"We thought we were finished," head coach Sam Koch said. "We're excited to be back this year."

The bad news is that the team has lost six seniors, including goalie Jon Gruber and defenseman Dan Lawrence. Gruber was an All-New England selection last year, and he and Lawrence will be missed.

"It's hard to replace Dan and Jon," Koch said. "Jon was an All-American candidate and has had pro tryouts, and Dan's leadership will be sorely missed."

Co-captains Shawn Bleau, a midfielder, and Todd Kylish, a defenseman, will be looked to provide leadership for the team. Four newcomers who may step in are Colin Johnson, Brad Miller, Dan Chagnon and Hossein Giahi. Giahi, a sophomore from Tehran, Iran is a forward. Miller and Johnson are midfielders, and Chagnon is slated for defense.

Koch said he envisions another tough year in the Atlantic 10 Conference, with UMass again battling for a tournament seed.

"Rutgers has been in the NCAA finals 2 of the last 3 years, George Washington is usually in the Top 20, and West Virginia and Temple are always tough. You can't tell where we'll be because you gotta see how much stronger those teams are."

Koch said he is also impressed with the development of many of the team's players, but especially Joel Pittman, Mike Doyle and Ted Priestley.

"Joel and Mike are some of the younger players who have improved," Koch said. "Ted is a junior who was a walk-on, and his performance has improved."

The road to the A-10s goes through places like Rhode Island, Dartmouth and Northeastern. This year, UMass plays Temple, Connecticut and Providence at home. While these foes will be formidable, a home field advantage will help the young team.

The men's soccer team, which had conceded the fact that the program would be cut at the end of last year, miraculously qualified for the A-10 Tournament on the last weekend of the season. UMass gained the moral support of its sister A-10 schools before the donation.

position," said Wong. "But it hasn't been difficult finding candidates, and it hasn't been difficult finding good ones."

The search committee has received 75 applications and has a list of 12 candidates, Wong said. However, because of the nature of the language in the job advertisement, an advisory committee already in place can actively pursue candidates who have not yet applied, and applications can still be accepted.

The search committee will at some point in the next few months make a recommendation to O'Brien, who will then make an offer to the candidate(s). The process could take another 2 to 3 months, so Wong may be around for a while.

Wong said it wasn't imperative for O'Brien to hire a candidate from outside of the University in order to maintain the integrity of the athletic department.

"I think they're going to have to bring in someone with varied skills," Wong said. "Someone on campus may have better skills in certain areas than a person off campus, but someone off campus may have other attributes that the Chancellor may feel are more important."

Wong said he has not applied for the position of athletic director. The advisory committee could conceivably ask him to apply. Regardless, Wong said he is hoping to point UMass athletics in the right direction, at least for the time being.

What Morrissey did this summer

Michael
MORRISSEY

Let's see, where was I before I was rudely interrupted. . . There was a long summer full of interesting sports developments, leading off with the retirement of Larry Bird. I'll leave it to the professionals to wax prophetic on Mr. Bird, as I admit I wasn't a very big Celtics fan growing up. I much rather preferred The 76ers. At any rate, I think what separated Bird from every other player was Larry's work ethic.

Here was a man who got to do what he loved most in the world, and he never once complained about it. Bird's work ethic was motivated by a fear, a fear of not being somebody, a fear of working as a garbageman. Bird feared the fact that he might wake up some day and say to himself, "You had the chance to play basketball for a living, and you wasted it away." Bird got a second chance, and he made the most of it, to say the least.

Anyway, I had the chance to see what major league baseball is like in other cities, and it made me hate the Boston Red Sox organization. I drove down to Atlanta during the first week of August to see the Braves take on the Reds in an National League West showdown.

Seeing Terry Pendleton hit a 2-out, 2-run ninth inning game-winning home run was pretty much the highlight of the trip. The next night, Bip Roberts almost killed himself by running into the center field fence. Atlanta swept the Reds and won't look back until they win the World Series.

On the way back, I visited Oriole Park at Camden Yards. One word: WOW! It's obviously the nicest park in the big leagues and the place was sold out for a Friday night game against the Cleveland Indians.

On the way to Atlanta, I caught a glimpse of both Duke University and the University of North Carolina. Both places are beautiful inside and out, and I can't really compare them to this place. Saw Cameron Indoor Stadium and the back-to-back National Championship banners of the hoop team. Don't count out the Blue Devils for a third (although the safe money is with the Minutemen).

For those of you from South Carolina, two questions: 1) What is the difference between a Stuckey's and a Shoney's? 2) Do South Carolinians only have eight fingers from inbreeding or from blowing their fingers off with fireworks? The first five correct respondents win tickets to the Greenville International Speedway 500.

O'Brien plans departure

Says relieved to end term

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Chancellor Richard O'Brien announced last week he will reliquish the helm of the University after the conclusion of the academic year.

After his two-year interim term as chancellor officially ends on June 30, 1993, O'Brien said he will go on sabbatical leave for one year and said during an interview that he will decide his future plans during that leave.

O'Brien was appointed to the post in May 1991 after his predecessor, President-Chancellor Joseph Duffey, resigned in March 1991 after having served for almost 9 years.

O'Brien made his announcement to about 350 people from the University and surrounding towns at the 30th annual Community Breakfast held at the Franklin Dining Commons.

During the yearly breakfast, attended by state and local politicians, members of the academic community and Amherst residents, O'Brien pointed to examples indicating the financially hurting University is making a comeback.

He said the state budget is looking better than it has in recent years because the Legislature is recognizing that funding education is an investment in the state's economy. O'Brien said the freshman class this year includes 3,900 students, an increase of 700 students from last year's figure.

O'Brien said the University will recruit 100 new faculty this year, compared to four last year. He also pointed out that tuition and fees increased this year by 4 percent, compared to much larger increases in past years. O'Brien also praised the new sports facility, the William Mullins Memorial Center, scheduled to open up in February.

O'Brien said while he considers the position of Chancellor to have positive features, particularly having enjoyed working with a "splendid staff," he said he was relieved in many ways to see his term come to an end.

"It will be nice to be an ordinary human being again," said O'Brien.

Most administrators said they were pleased with O'Brien's work thus far, being sympathetic to his having to jump in and quickly out of the two-year term.

"He did a great job right at a critical time period and provided outstanding leadership," said Gordon Oakes, the Chairperson of the University's Board of Trustees. Oakes said since O'Brien's appointment, a strong sense of mission has developed on campus, with various schools and departments working together.

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Oakes said because of budget uncertainties and the limited time frame involved in the interim appointment, it was hoped that O'Brien's appointment would give the University time to determine where it was headed, with newly-elected President Michael Hooker able to aid the process of choosing the next chancellor.

"It's worked out just as we planned," Oakes said.

Robert Karam, vice chairperson of the Board of Trustees, said O'Brien has done a "fine job articulating the position of the flagship campus and educating the new trustees as to the importance of the Amherst campus and what they're doing."

Florida reels as hurricane leaves legacy

By MICHAEL FLEEMAN
Associated Press

HOMESTEAD, Fla. — Building inspectors and social workers went door-to-door Thursday, trying to coax more people out of their hurricane-ravaged and possibly dangerous homes and into military tent cities.

More rain fell on the area smashed by Hurricane Andrew on Aug. 24, making busy roads slippery and weighing down soaked, sagging ceiling materials exposed by the storm. At least four homes collapsed overnight because of the rain, Homestead Police Maj. Chuck Habermehl said.

No new injuries were reported.

Democratic presidential nominee Bill Clinton joined the long line of politicians visiting Southern Florida, flying to the heavily damaged Homestead Air Force Base that President Bush promised to rebuild even though some Democrats in Congress are opposed.

The rain, which forecasters said would pick up again this weekend, dampened some of the earlier optimism about the huge relief and rebuilding effort that has brought nearly 34,000 military personnel to Florida.

"Today, I was hoping to see the progress I'm hearing about, but it was hard to see," Linda Shelley, secretary of the Florida Department of Community Affairs, said after a helicopter tour.

Residents she talked to complained of not enough ice, water and toilets and too many mosquitoes. The Air Force helped Dade County with aerial spraying. State officials asked pool companies to volunteer to clean up stagnant swimming pools where mosquitoes have started breeding.

The White House announced that the Small Business Administration had speeded up its handling of loan applications from hurricane victims in Florida and Louisiana, reducing the usual 30-day processing period to seven days.

Students claim new system easier

No more getting up at 3 a.m. No more lines with 100 sleepy students trying to get into 5 available seats. And no more computer bubble sheets.

Welcome to the 21st century, UMass.

This semester, the University has started a new registration system that uses touchtone telephones. Students no longer wait in long lines to check for available spaces in classes or put their names on waiting lists in the hopes that other students will drop a course.

Students now use their touchtone phone to change their schedules, eliminating the need for computer forms.

The system automatically checks seat availability and student eligibility before allowing a student to add a class, and allows students to select a pass/fail option and review their selections. Students can call as many times as necessary until the add/drop deadline on Sept. 22.

What the system will not do is put the students name on a waiting list. So what do students do if the class they need is full?

"Keep calling to see if spaces open up as other students drop," said Nancy Fitzpatrick, undergraduate registrar.

"Or the student can appeal to the department," Fitzpatrick said. She said that students must know that if they try to add a class through the professors they must still be sure that the de-

Hunger on rise in nation due to increased poverty

By JONATHAN YENKIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — About 30 million Americans who are poor or struggle to get by fail to eat enough food, as hunger spreads its web beyond inner cities to the heartland, a new study says.

The research, prepared for Congress by a leading authority on nutrition, estimates hunger has grown by 50 percent since the mid-1980s.

"When we see increasing poverty and decreasing incomes, it's not at all surprising that hunger has increased," said J. Larry Brown, director of Tufts University's Center on Hunger, Poverty and Nutrition Policy.

The increase in hunger also creates potential for more learning deficiencies among young children, more illnesses among the elderly and diminished productivity for workers, he said.

In 1985, Brown led a national task force sponsored by Harvard University that warned 20 million Americans suffer hunger, defined as a condition where people face threats to their health because they repeatedly don't consume enough nutrients.

Brown said he has great confidence in the updated figures because three different methods wee used to calculate the numbers, and each resulted in a total around 30 million.

He put much of the blame on inadequacies of the federal food stamps program, which he said doesn't meet dietary needs and often doesn't reach eligible people.

Lisa Hoffman, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Food and Nutrition Service, which oversees food stamps, said some poor eligible people don't get the benefits simply becuase they fail to apply. But she added, "we think it is reaching the people who are most in need."

In addition, Hoffman said the food stamps program "is meant to be a supplement to a diet. It's not meant to finance the whole food income."

She also cited federal studies that show little difference in the nutrients consumed by low-income children compared with wealthy children.

The primary method for the hunger study relied on various poverty figures, such as estimates of poor people who collect food stamps but don't get enough nutrients. The numbers also accounted for people above the poverty line whose relatively low incomes make them susceptible to hunger.

A second method used state surveys that asked people several questions, such as whether they ever skip meals or cut the seize of meals. The third method relied on results from a national public opinion poll that asked people if they knew someone close to them who didn't always have enough to eat.

The study also calculated a low estimate for the number of hungry Americans would

Beer company infilitrates MTV

By DIANE DUSTON
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — An internal videotape by Miller Brewing Co. touts the company's success placing its beer in music videos "to penetrate the hard-to-reach young adult market."

Getting the "one-and-only Lite beer to star right along side top recording artists like the one-and-only Bruce Springsteen" is extolled as a way to reach "the all-important entry level drinker over and over and over again."

"And that means MTV can mean Miller Television, providing brand awareness to over 6.5 million adult males every day," says the video. "By placing Miller Brewing Co.'s products in today's music videos, Miller is able to penetrate the hard-to-reach young adult market."

Miller officials say the tape was made in the mid-1980s for corporate use only, but a coalition of groups trying to prevent alcoholism, drunken driving and underage drinking says it reveals the company has been "sneaking" beer ads into other formats to encourage young people to drink.

Under the leadership of Center for Science in the Public Interest, the groups announced Thursday that they had petitioned the Federal Trade Commission to halt these "product placement" ads.

Steve Gardner, a law professor and consumer advocate, speaking at a press conference, said such ads are harmful because "the consumer is never aware he or she is the recipient of a commercial pitch."

Job market showing promise

WASHINGTON (AP) — New claims for unemployment benefits in mid-August held near a two-year low for the second consecutive week, the government said Thursday, offering hope that the nation's job market is perking up.

The number of claims increased a less-than-expected 3,000 to 386,000 during the week ended Aug. 22, the Labor Department said. Before the previous week, the claims number had not dipped below 40,000 since October 1990, early in the recession.

"We're gradually crawling up from the bottom," said economist David Wyss of DRI-McGraw Hill, a Lexington, Mass., forecasting firm.

Meanwhile, the nation's largest retailers reported mostly modest increases in August sales as Hurricane Andrew depressed results in the South and a late Labor Day holiday delayed back-to-school shopping.

Auto companies manufacturing in the United States reported an 8.3 percent increase in vehicles sold during the last 10 days of August. But a 21.7 percent jump in light truck sales masked an anemic 0.4 percent rise in cars sold.

Despite five consecutive quarters of economic growth through June, the unemployment rate continued to rise, hitting an eight year high of 7.8 percent in June.

It edged down to 7.7 percent in July and economists expect a report being released Friday to show a further decrease to 7.6 percent in August.

Condom ads raise heads in subway

BOSTON (AP) — Three condom ads have been approved for use in subway cars, but AIDS activists say it may be too late.

The advertisements are among seven submitted by the state AIDS Action Committee to run in the subway and on streetcars. The Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority ran four of the ads, but delayed running the other three because they were "too provocative."

But the AIDS committee has no money left to run the ads next month after paying for the four ads run during month-long back-to school campaign, said spokesman Thomas McNaught. The group paid $12 per card for 476 subway and streetcar advertisements for the campaign.

MBTA spokesman Peter Dimond said: "If they resubmit them we'll run them, but we hope they don't."

The T is working hard to build ridership, to encourage more people to take the T," he said. "We don't want to see anything that would discourage people from using public transportation."

All seven ads showed pictures of rolled-up condoms, with texts that claimed they were the best way to prevent AIDS.

The text for one of the three previously rejected reads:

"It'll grow on you. Use a latex condom. You'll get used to it. It's thin, stretchable, and the best way to prevent AIDS."

Class of '96 begins trek to graduation

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Correspondent

Last weekend's annual opening day Convocation for new students offered a rousing kickoff to a new academic year, as over 2,100 students crowded into the steamy Fine Arts Center to hear pep talks from various campus administrators and officials.

The lucky few with seats were treated to a slide show by senior Kenneth Chu, highlighting the various activities on campus from athletics to student government.

A tuba fanfare by the campus herald, Professor Walter Chestnut, commenced the speeches. Chancellor Richard O'Brien welcomed the "largest freshman class in all of New England" and introduced his robed colleagues.

Dr. Thomas Robinson, newly-appointed as vice chancellor for Student Affairs, gave a short speech. Dr. Robinson said he empathized with students about the process of moving away from home and the ordeal of finding their way around campus.

Student Government Association President Jennifer Wood urged new students to register to vote in Amherst and also to get involved in the vast array of activities available on campus.

Bailey Jackson, dean of the School of Education, gave the keynote address and welcomed the students to UMass and encouraged them to "be aggressive, open and reflective and make contact with faculty."

Dr. Jackson said he believes "diversity helps us to build a multicultural campus" and that students need a multicultural perspective to face the world. He ended his speech with a stirring rendition of Dr. Seuss's "Oh the Places You'll Go."

John Calipari, coach of the men's basketball team, delivered a rousing pep talk which may make Minutemaniacs out of the incoming first-year students.

The highlight of the evening was the ever-popular UMass Minuteman Marching Band, directed by Professor George N. Parks. The Band's first selection was the Batman movie theme. The band flashed the Batman distress symbol and the Caped Crusader put in a rare appearance at the convocation.

Another exciting moment came when the band filed into the audience and played from various standpoints. This drew the crowd into the performance and the chants of "Go, Fight, Win" increased in volume.

The band played for almost 45 minutes and implored interested students to sign up. They finished off the evening with the UMass fight song and the alma mater.

The evening hopefully served to excite the first-year students and prepare them for both the good times and the challenges that face them in the years to come.

First Black Mississippi mayor rakes in $350,000

By DAVID RIVERA
Collegian Staff

Unita Blackwell, 59, the first Black mayor in the state of Mississippi and a 1983 graduate of the University of Massachusetts, was awarded a $350,000 MacArthur Fellowship in June.

"My first reaction was to scream," Blackwell said. "I've worked very hard all my life and I'm honored and grateful for the award.

Blackwell is the fifth person connected to the University of Massachusetts to receive the fellowship commonly known as the "genius award" and the third alumnus of the regional planning program to be so honored.

Just weeks before receiving the fellowship she was given an honorary Doctrine of Law from Tougaloo College in Mississippi.

"I received the Doctrine in May and then I received a call soon after telling me about the Fellowship," Blackwell said. "It's been a very exciting year."

The John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation of Chicago has awarded the open-ended grants since 1981 to enable recipients to use their talents free of financial constraints. Awardees are proposed to the Foundation by a group of more than 100 designated nominators from across the country who serve anonymously for one year.

Blackwell received her master's degree in regional planning from the University of Massachusetts in 1983 after starting graduate school at age 48. She became president of the National Conference of Black Mayors in 1989 and won an election as mayor of Mayersville, Mississippi, population 500-plus, in 1976. Over the years, Blackwell has overseen construction of sewer and water systems and housing for the elderly and disabled in Mayersville, as well as the establishment of a street maintenance program.

Noting that she owes a great deal of her success to her UMass professors, Blackwell said UMass was a pioneer of higher education.

"It's good to see us folks from UMass doing so well," Blackwell said, "It's not just Harvard anymore."

The daughter of a sharecropper, Blackwell became a civil rights activist and at one time was repeatedly arrested and jailed in the town where is now mayor. She is a subject of the collection "I Dream a World: Portraits of Black Women Who Changed America" by photographer Brian Lanker, and is seen on a pilgrimage to China in the documentary film "Women Hold Up Half The Sky," by actress Shirley MacLaine.

Besides being a veteran civil rights organizer, Blackwell is a past president of the U.S.-China People's Friendship Association and has traveled to China at least 15 times.

She returned to campus in the 1990-91 academic year as part of the Eleanor Bateman program, which invites alumni back to the University to share their experiences

UMass professors receive federal grant

By MICHAEL R. LINSKEY
Collegian Staff

Three University of Massachusetts scientists have been awarded a $480,000 grant to study polyester-forming microorganisms and to learn more about non-petroleum-based plastics derived from these organisms.

Awarded by the National Science Foundation, the grant will finance a project directed by UMass biochemist R. Clinton Fuller, microbiologist Steven Goodwin and polymer scientist Robert W. Lenz.

Fuller, an internationally recognized photosynthesis expert, and Lenz, a pioneer in polymer science, have long collaborated in the study of biodegradable plastics. Goodwin is an associate professor of microbiology and a highly regarded microbial ecologist.

Fuller said the team's unorthodox approach to the study of biological plastics may lead to new discoveries within the field.

"Our approach to studying biologically made polyester is a bit unusual," he said. "We are probably the first to formally integrate the study of polymers with biochemistry and more recently microbiology — and certainly Steve Goodwin's contribution in microbiology adds a new dimension to our work."

Lenz, noting that Japan and several European countries are heavily funding such research, said its economic potential is tremendous.

"World demand for plastics came close to 100 million metric tons in 1991, and industry is increasingly preoccupied with the management of plastic waste," Lenz said. "The long-range goal of the UMass research is to learn how to biologically make polymers for a wide range of uses ranging from agricultural to biomedical to consumer."

Biologically-made plastics have recently received attention from industry because they are believed to be completely biodegradable, are virtually indistinguishable from the petroleum-based plastics now used and are not made from scarce and expensive petroleum resources.

Fuller said the grant will help further research already conducted under a recently depleted grant forom the United States Navy.

"A few years before industry became preoccupied with plastic waste, we were working on the problem for the U.S. Navy," he said. "As far back as 1986, we were obtaining useful information about biodegrable plastics from working on the problem for the Office of Naval Research."

Fuller said one of the advantages to using the natural plastics being studied is they are inherently biodegradable and will ultimately be broken down by bacteria. Biodegradability, however, is only one of the goals Fuller said the team is seeking.

New discovery sheds light on Amherst poet

By TRUDY TYNAN
Associated Press

AMHERST — A newly discovered letter from Emily Dickinson to her sister-in-law provides some new clues as to why the reclusive poet withdrew from the world, scholars say.

The letter and a second to her sister-in-law were acquired by Amherst College from a private party, who requested anonymity, college spokesman Doug Wilson said Wednesday. He said they had been discovered in Pennsylvania, tucked into an early edition of Dickinson's poetry.

"It's extremely exciting," said Polly Longsworth, a Dickinson biographer from Williamsburg, Va., "because it is the closest thing we have to Emily herself putting a name to what was troubling her."

In the letter, the 27-year-old poet declines an invitation from her sister-in-law and closest friend, Susan Dickinson, who lived next door:

"You will forgive me if I never visit. I am from the fields, you know, and while quite at home with the dandelion, make a sorry figure in a drawing room.

". . . Do not mind me, Susie. If I do not come with feet, in my heart I come — talk the most and laugh the longest — stay when all the rest have gone — kiss your cheek, perhaps, while those honest people quite forget you in their sleep."

She also shyly mentions in the note that she watched her sister-in-law bring flowers to the house earlier in the day, but did not venture downstairs to talk with her.

"She is saying I just can't function in the social situation you are inviting me to," said Longsworth. The event is not identified in the letter, but Longsworth said it may have been something as simple as a gathering of women, given Dickinson's references to "roses" and "lilies."

"There is definitely the sense that while she would be comfortable in an everyday situation, she can't cope with refinement, sophistication and superficiality," Longsworth said.

The letter's date, which Amherst College has tentatively placed as 1858, makes it "very significant," because it would be around the time when she began her retreat to the bedroom of her father's Amherst home and her poetry, said Donald Porter, a Dickinson scholar at the University of Massachusetts.

Only a handful of her poems were published during her life and those anonymously. The rest she left, stitched together with thread, in a bureau

The state Department of Labor reported Thursday that 60,000 homes had been destroyed in Florida, leaving 250,000 people homeless. It said 86,000 people were thrown out of work by the storm. More than 400,000 people remained without electricity.

Other federal and local agencies have produced widely varying estimates of the number of homes destroyed.

State officials also said 1.9 million meals had been served at 110 sites.

As of Thursday, the hurricane was blamed for 46 deaths in Florida, Louisiana and the Bahamas. Damage in Florida has been estimated at $20 billion.

Five tent cities in Homestead and Florida City with room for 3,800 people were up, but only a few hundred peole used them Wednesday night. The Army said seven more could be built, bringing the capacity to 20,000 people.

Some said they stayed with their damaged houses because they feared looters and others were simply unwilling to leave what they called home.

"It's just because we've lived here so long, 20 years, that, I don't know, I just wanted to stay here," said Kathy Shawger.

PAWSS pulls in Hewlett grant

By DAVID RIVERA
Collegian Staff

The Five College Peace and World Securities Program, known widely as PAWSS, received a $300,000 award from the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation.

PAWSS Director Michael Klare said the grant will enable the program to make the much needed 3 year transition in curriculum reflecting the changing times in Global relations.

"With this grant we will be able to hire more internships," Klare said, "It will also help the academics decide what's next."

Klare said the shift in world events caused by the end of the Cold War, which caught many in the academic world by surprise, is forcing a change in PAWSS' strategy.

"The funds will help bring in special teachers," Klare said. "UMass will definitely benefit from this grant."

Throughout the 1980s, as U.S.-Soviet relations threatened the world order, PAWSS concentrated its efforts on providing faculty and students with the most current and accurate information on issues of disarmament and relations between the superpowers.

Its January faculty workshop and intensive summer institute have developed a national following and have given hundreds of college and university teachers access to highly specialized sources of information over the years.

While serving the needs of teachers at all levels, PAWSS recently published a curriculum and resource guide and offered stipends for Five College Faculty who wish to develop new courses in curriculum materials in the field.

Klare said he expects the dynamic pace of programing will only be enhanced by the Hewlett grant.

Royal couple keep distance during rare public appearance

By MAUREEN JOHNSON
Associated Press

NOTTINGHAM, England — Some brought flowers, some waved Union Jacks. But the big draw Wednesday was the body language as Prince Charles and Princess Diana made their first public appearance together after a summer of fevered speculation about their marriage.

The smiles were in place, small talk and handshakes flowed smoothly as they worked the crowd, maintaining a big gap between them.

"You'd need a wide-angle lens to get them together," grumbled 16-year-old Jason Batterham, who brought his camera to catch the couple on a visit to the university hospital.

"They're about six feet apart. You'd think he'd wait for her."

"What do you expect them to do, hold hands?" snapped a middle-aged woman as the 43-year-old heir to the throne and Diana, 31, alighted from the royal limousine.

Despite it all — speculation about a separation, a book quoting friends of Diana saying her 12-year-old marriage is a loveless sham, a tape of an alleged intimate conversation between the princess and a male friend — the royal magic worked again.

"Diana's just the most wonderful woman in the world," said Thelma Lowther, a devoted royalist who said she had been in the crowd outside Westminster Abbey in 1952 for the coronation of the queen.

Added Mrs. Lowther, "I love the royals, but I am a bit disappointed at the way things have turned out."

At the hospital and afterwards, Charles and Diana split up to pursue separate programs. Standard procedure, royal aides insisted.

But with the monarchy battling some of its most trying times since Charle's great-uncle, Edward VIII, abdicated to marry a twice-divorced American in 1936, things look different even to the most loyal subject.

Onlookers gossiped about the royal marriages; much sympathy for Diana, some for Charles, general disapproval for the Duchess of York, the estranged wife of Prince Andrew who was photographed topless last month with an American male friend.

"At least two of the plastics we've discovered so far have extremely novel properties, and we think possible commercial applications," Fuller said. "One is a strong, hard plastic, and the other is a durable rubber-like material."

The team is now searching for other such natural plastics, and the UMass research group — comprised of 20 students, postdoctorates and visiting scientists — is learning from Fuller, Lenz and some graduate students.

The University of Massachusetts has one of the country's oldest polymer research programs, and with the projected 1994 completion of the $50 million Conte National Polymer Research Center, the University will have the largest polymer research laboratory in the nation.

Look beyond the color and stop teaching hate

My younger sister is an adopted Korean. When we were younger we would always play together. One day while playing in the sandbox, a boy approached me and asked if he could join me. I said yes, and we built our castles together peacefully. A few minutes passed and my sister came up to us. As she climbed over the ledge into the sandbox, the boy yelled, "She can't play, she's Chinese."

"She can too," I replied, "she's Renee, she's not Chinese."

E. C.
THOMAS

I didn't realize the importance of that moment until my father told me the story a few months ago. Racism is something taught, not something we are born with. In school we are taught the white man's history and his dominance of both Blacks and women. Through T.V. we are taught the stereotypes: the violent Hispanic, the rapist Black, the stupid Chinaman, the dumb blonde. In the judicial system we are taught that a Black's word doesn't stand up against a White's. Even in our language we are taught that white is good, black is evil.

I watched an Oprah Winfrey show this summer, where a teacher claimed that brown-eyed people were smarter than blue-eyed people. All the blue-eyed audience members had been segregated from the brown-eyed; even the bathrooms were designated blue and brown.

The more the teacher spoke the more enraged the audience grew. They sincerely believed her claim. Even I, who am blue-eyed, found myself increasingly offended and yelling out my anger at the T.V.

By 4:30, the brown-eyed people were generalizing about all blue-eyed stupidity, the blue-eyed people were trying to defend themselves by shouting out their SAT scores, people were yelling back and forth and a brawl was all but about to begin.

Finally Oprah and the teacher explained that what had just occurred was an exercise in racism — the audience went dead silent. Until the beginning of that program all the brown-eyed and blue-eyed people thought of themselves as basically equal. It wasn't until they were told otherwise that all hell broke loose.

When you are born, you look at people's differences with curiosity. As you grow, your mind and thoughts are shaped by society so that eventually you look at people's differences with animosity. Fear conquers understanding, ignorance conquers acceptance. Society teaches its children, through history, language and media that anyone differing from the "norm" is subservient to the rest, and should be treated accordingly. Essentially, we teach hate.

With all the political preaching about family values, it's sad to think no one has thought about society's values, and their effect on families.

Think about it: a country where no one is afraid to stand up to the people in the sandboxes who won't play with someone who is different.

A country where blue equals brown, white equals black — red equals yellow.

A country where all could look past a person's color and look at the person.

Think about it. Stop the ignorance — stop the hate.

Stricken with anxiety? You're not the only one

Have you ever wondered when the time would come that you'd start feeling "grown up?" When you wouldn't feel like a scared little kid anymore? I have. I still do. I look in the mirror every day waiting to see a "woman" and yet I always see my own reflection — the same one I've been looking at for the past nineteen years. I keep asking myself when it is I'll have the answers, when it is I'll actually grow up? When and how because I'm growing extremely anxious for the "transformation" to take place.

Rebecca
LAVERDURE

This past week I've been agonizing about what it is I'm doing here, what the meaning of my life is and will be. I've been asking everybody I know for the answer, young and old alike, but no one will give it to me. Well, they tell me that life is a gift, etc. etc. . . and I have to celebrate it, etc. etc. . . but my question is "How?" It's a simple question, at least I think so, and yet they keep telling me that I'm the only one who can answer it. That's what scares me more than anything else in the world.

How can I answer that? I'm just me — I have no answers, only a million more questions. Whenever I've had questions before my parents gave me answers, or my teachers, or books — but there was always an answer out there, somewhere. Now I'm supposed to look within myself for an answer? When did I gain so much wisdom to be able to answer the meaning of life? When and where, because no one told me about it. Did I skip some crucial class or miss the handout on "How to Answer Those Nagging Questions Like 'What's the Meaning of Life?'" I know I'm missing something, some essential ingredient to surviving because I'm still me, I still like to color — I don't know how to pick a career. . . and yet other people seem so sure that I can. Maybe I should be an actress because I sure fooled somebody, somewhere along the way.

My parents keep telling me I'm just growing up, that everybody goes through this at some point or another. Why doesn't anybody warn you about these things? Maybe something like, "Oh yeah, by the way, you'll have a little bit of trouble trying to figure out the meaning of your life right when you go to decide how to live it because you'll feel like you're a little bit empowered, but not even that much and even that much power will scare the living crap out of you." You know, just a little something so that you won't think you're totally alone in your anxiety and decide you're just flat out going crazy.

But the funny thing is, when I don't feel like I'm going crazy, I feel like I can actually do something real with my life, that I can make a difference. But then the question pops up again, "How?" I'm awed at the significance my achievements could have, but at the same time I'm petrified of that very same power. What if I use it unwisely? What if I just lose it and start undressing in the middle of a lecture? Or what would happen if I become so afraid the world is too much for me that I just decide to never get out of bed again? I could conceivably do either.

To put it bluntly, I'm terrified of failing. I feel like I won't be able to do it, to succeed, because I'm just little old me and, and what in the world can I do? If other people knew how much I still feel like a kid inside would they still be so confident that I can answer these questions? How can I be sure that I have the power, the know-how, the courage to create a life and be satisfied with it. If only I knew I wouldn't crumble and fall at the very first challenge I met. If only I were sure I'm not missing any essential ingredients. If only I knew I were on the threshold of success and not failure.

I guess I'm supposed to be ending this with some kind of conclusion — we all learned about those conclusion paragraphs in college writing — but to be honest, I have none. But what I do have to offer is comfort, the kind that comes with knowing you're not alone. I know it's said "the unexamined life is not worth living," but the examined one can feel a little overwhelming at times. . . for everyone.

Health clinic answers charges

UMass is more than willing to apologize again to Beverly Beckham, just as we did in January after she originally brought to our attention her daughter's experience at Health Services (Collegian, Sept. 9).

UMass took action by re-emphasizing to the staff member involved the need for confidentiality and respect when talking to students. That is a message we stress to all employees.

We also apologize for the apparent misunderstanding with the bursar. He said he'd wait a reasonable period of time before taking action. After not hearing further on the issue for a month, he initiated withdrawal procedures for non-payment of the health fee. The daughter was immediately reinstated upon Ms. Beckham's phone call.

While we sympathize with Ms. Beckham's concern for her daughter and will do whatever we can to help her daughter receive the sensitive care she deserves, the health services fees are required of all students. Parents with concerns about Health Services may contact the health services director or the vice chancellor for Student Affairs.

Even summer vacation can't save columnist from scrod

Back to campus, back to politics, microfridges and scrod.

Hello, hello, hello! It's me again — yes, I'm back. Scary, isn't it? Well, I was trying to come up with a decent first column-type thing and this is the result. Before I begin, I would like to remind the various University services that if they cannot take a joke, well, they should not read any further. Enough said. Let the column begin!

I went through the summer hoping to keep out of reach of scrod. Sure enough, I ended up working in a deli that carried scrod specials three times a week. Of course, this started my scrod nightmares. Food Services will surely keep these nightmares coming — the horror, the horror. As if this was not enough, I spent my working days convincing myself that I would not make it out of that scrod pit with all my fingers intact. After a couple of near misses I made it through okay.

As you can tell, that disgusting scrod reminded me of UMass. So, as the day to return to school neared, I started thinking about what UMass would be like this year.

I know Food Services made some changes, but would they be up to par? What about Hel— I mean Housing Services? Would our microfridges be waiting in our rooms for us as promised? The campus itself?

Strolling around the University, I discovered many freshly painted signs — very exciting indeed. Not only were some signs painted, some were altogether new. Just look up when strolling down the Campus Center and take note of the change. Speaking of change. . . The political agenda is sure to add to UMass' hectic agenda.

Diana
D'AVANZO

Perhaps a little off the subject, let's talk about the ever- popular Clinton campaign and its "Pro-Choice is not Pro-Abortion" slogan. Right Bill. Now I really have heard it all. (Do I detect a little voter manipulation here?) No, this is not a Bush endorsement. Enough about politics, more about UMass. O.K, not enough about politics.

Back to the change line that led to my politics line. Seems like there is change in the air. Housing has given some happy seniors a double single, Food Services is allowing meal plan- goers, among other things, two free guest meals; the three-mile-long registration lines that seemed to haunt us at the beginning of each semester have all but disappeared thanks to the simple, almost wait-free telephone registration system; the dorms have been painted; it's a new school year and, of course, our faculty is top notch.

What is the point? Why am I writing this column? What is the meaning to life? Before getting into the meaning of life, let me cover the point: with all the budget cuts and bruises that we have taken over the past years, it looks like we are finally coming out of the heartache.

Don't get me wrong, much work still needs to be done. A major concern right now is the library, which is desperately in need of funding. Hopefully, with all the great things that are happening, the library will not be far behind.

Now for the differences in the first week schedule. Registration was covered. Let's talk entertainment. Batman II was one of the first week movies shown — not to worry, there are usually many good movies shown throughout the semester as well. You can always make a suggestion to your house council or resident assistant for a movie night.

Well, this is the end of my column. Before signing off, a brief reminder about some future work: The meaning of life will be coming soon to a column near you. God Bless!

U.N.: Iraq lacks nuclear facility

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — The leader of the U.N. weapons-search team said Thursday that Iraq no longer has facilities for making atomic bombs.

Maurizio Zifferero, an Italian who works with the International Atomic Energy Agency, told reporters: "There is no longer any nuclear activity in Iraq . . They have no facilities where (they can) carry out this activity."

At the end of the third day of inspections by the 21-member team, Zifferero said the "work was good, cooperation was good."

However, in a statement issued at its headquarters in Vienna, Austria, the U.N. agency said Zifferero was not issuing a "clean bill of health for Iraq in the nuclear sphere."

There has been considerable tension in recent months over the U.N. inspections that were mandated by the Gulf War cease-fire, which calls for the elimination of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. A U.N. team in July was refused entry to a ministry building for three weeks.

And the situation has become more potentially sensitive since the United States declared an air exclusion zone in southern Iraq, where Shiite rebels have been holed up since their 1991 rebellion against Saddam Hussein was crushed.

Casino-goers forget kids

By STRAT DOUTHAT
Associated Press

LEDYARD, Conn. — The Mashantucket Pequots' casino is cracking down on people who leave children or pets unattended in their cars while they gamble, sometimes for hours.

"There have been about a half a dozen instances since we opened, but if it happens once in 10 years it's still a problem," said casino president Al Luciani.

Luciani said he has ordered the casino patrol to be on the watch for occupied cars in the parking lot. If children are found in the cars, he said, authorities will be notified promptly.

"We page their parents and then we hook them up with the police," he said.

Thousands of gamblers have played at the tribe's Foxwoods High Stakes Bingo & Casino since it opened in February. The Pequots, eager to expand their casino into a family resort, have outlined plans to add hotels, restaurants, theaters and more gambling space.

The tribe estimates revenue in the first year at the casino will be $120 million.

Luciani and State Police Sgt. Thomas Snyder, who heads the casino unit, said none of the children left unsupervised so far has been physically injured or ill.

"My Mom, she thinks all I ever do is go through 'phases.' 'You changed your major again? Now it's Ethnic Dance Forms? When are you going to come to your senses and pick something sensible? (Sigh) Well, I guess it's just another phase.' So I told her, 'Give me a break Ma. I mean I kept the same phone company all four years'... She was impressed."

Karam pointed out that an interim term puts a lot of pressure on the person in the post because everything must be done in such a short time, not allowing the person to make long-term plans.

"I think he felt a great strain trying to accomplish things without the luxury of time to think of long-term efforts," said Karam. He added that it is difficult to encourage faculty on long-term goals when the post is short term.

"He's a great fan of basketball, he's real — he doesn't put up a facade and he's a good guy," said Karam.

Student Trustee Kevin Newnan said he was also pleased with the Chancellor's performance, particularly in light of such difficult financial times for the University.

"He assumed the helm of a sinking ship," said Newnan. "Certainly now we're in much more stable waters."

Newnan said the University is better off now than it was a year ago, financially and morally. He added that O'Brien has been a strong advocate for the campus.

"He's done an excellent job and the financial situation is better as a whole," said Newnan. "The student government has had much better dealings with the administration."

State Sen. Stanley Rosenberg said he too has enjoyed working with O'Brien.

"He has been extremely prompt and thorough in providing me with information to advocate for the University in the legislature," said Rosenberg. "I've found that he seems genuinely interested in understanding the nature of Massachusetts politics.

However, not all are supportive of O'Brien's performance and past decisions he has made. Legal studies professor John Bonsignore said he is not overly upset about the Chancellor's term ending.

"I don't think he handled the Graduate strike last semester diplomatically or constructively and he made for a lot of hard feelings. . . and [graduates] are the main line of teachers here," said Bonsignore, adding, "he's scientifically oriented and not sensitive to the humanities.

"No matter who it is, they serve as a lightning rod," said the acting Dean of Engineering, Keith Carver, who said he was impressed with O'Brien's leadership. "It's not possible to please all the different groups on such a diverse campus."

partment adds them into the computer.

The system seems to be working well, said Fitzpatrick, and most of the departments she spoke with reported no heavy lines.

"It's much better than those lines," said Ken Sugarman, a junior civil engineering major. He said the system was "very easy and very helpful. I got through right away."

Marie Valbrun, a freshman HRTA major, said that she was initially apprehensive about the system.

"It sounded hard, but it was easy," Valbrun said.

"I found the phones a lot easier, it's more up-to-date. I could find out right away if I could get a class," said Angela Smith, a junior psychology major who is at UMass on exchange from Northern Arizona University.

Not all classes are available via telephone and some departments, such as journalism, are not using the phone system at all.

"In general, courses which are required for majors are offline because we give courses based on need, not first come, first serve," said Nancy Hare, administrative assistant to the journalism department.

Hare said that the department talked over the options and decided that although it is more work to hand load each course it was important to maintain lists to ensure that students needs were best met.

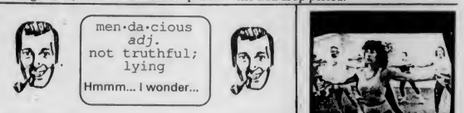
Hare also said that some courses which other departments did not offer on the phone system, such as independent studies, were online in journalism.

Registrar Fitzpatrick said that the voice response units that the system uses cost $200,000.

Fitzpatrick said the new system eliminated work needed to process 25,000 computer forms, but that other duties have been added.

"We opened the system in August and the help line was very busy. We've also had a lot of students in the office to get a copy of their schedule," Fitzpatrick said.

She said that all students will get a copy of their revised schedule at the end of the add/drop period.



There's a lot more than a great calculator waiting for you when you purchase an HP 48SX or an HP 48S between June 1, 1992, and October 31, 1992. You'll get a bonus book that's good for free software, a free PC link cable and hundreds of dollars back on applications—like electrical and mechanical engineering—memory cards, training tools, games, and HP's infrared printer.
It's a really big offer. Worth more than $500. And it's going to make your HP 48 calculator even more valuable to you. The free serial cable lets you exchange information with your PC. And the free software disk lets you enter and plot equations easily, do 3D plotting, and analyze polynomials.
Beyond all the bonuses, you'll have the right calculator for your most challenging classes. HP 48 calculators have over 2100 built-in functions and offer a unique combination of graphics and calculus.
Head over to the campus bookstore now. After all, you don't see this kind of deal every day. HP calculators. The best for your success.

Dems gain endorsement

Environmentalists praise Gore's record

By JILL LAWRENCE
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Democratic presidential ticket of Bill Clinton and Al Gore won support Thursday from two national environmental groups, the League of Conservation Voters and the Sierra Club.

The two non-partisan groups accused President Bush of reneging on his pledge to be the environmental president and breaking specific promises he made during his 1988 campaign.

Clinton has had a mixed environmental record as governor of Arkansas. But the groups said his choice of Tennessee Sen. Gore for a running mate proved his commitment to their cause.

"Gore has not only supported environmental legislation, he has written most of it," League president Bruce Babbitt said of the Tennessee senator. He said Gore's presence on the Democratic ticket makes it the clear choice for environmentalists.

The Sierra Club said Thursday it would formally endorse Clinton and Gore in news conferences around the country on Friday. It was only the second presidential endorsement since the club was founded 100 years ago; the first was in 1984, when the groups endorsed Walter Mondale over Ronald Reagan.

Sierra Club president H. Anthony Ruckel, in remarks prepared for delivery Friday in Little Rock, Ark., called Bush "an environmental disaster."

He said Bush had promised to protect wetlands, fight the greenhouse effect, pass a national recycling plan, support a strong Clean Air Act and be "a Teddy Roosevelt environmentalist."

"He has broken every single promise," Ruckel said. "How can we possibly trust him?"

The league, in a similar vein, said Bush's 1988 pledge to be the environmental president "seems to have followed the path of 'read my lips, no new taxes.'"

In a rating of the two tickets, the league praises Clinton for environmental moves during the last few years, for commitments he has made to fight pollution and promote conservation if elected president, and for choosing Gore.

Village rocked by tidal wave

By JOHN RICE
Associated Press

EL TRANSITO, Nicaragua — Among donations that piled up Thursday were two child-size coffins — an unneeded reminder that the 800 villagers lost almost as many lives in a tidal wave as all of Florida did in Hurricane Andrew.

The quake-spawned wave that smashed into Nicaragua's southwest coast Tuesday night devastated this little fishing town.

By Thursday morning, 14 bodies had been recovered in EL Transito and 10 children remained missing and feared dead, according to federal health officials here.

Capt. Guillarmo Guevara, chief of the Civil Defense Department, told ambassadors in Managua on Thursday that 116 people were confirmed dead in this Central American nation, 350 were injured and about 700 houses destroyed. He said earlier that 150 people were missing.

On Thursday, waves broke upon the beach with a calm, stately rhythm.

Francisco and Rosibel Avita walked barefoot along the surf, poking delicately at the mounds of sand, searching for a daughter stolen by the sea.

Much of the village nestled in a gentle bay 35 miles west of Managua is now a gruesome scatter of shattered roofing, broken concrete and splintered wood.

Dozens of people spent the night in the pews of a Catholic Church on the hill above town, sleeping amid bales of clothing and boxes of food donated by Nicaraguans and foreign agencies.

Health Ministry nurses stacked medicine atop the alter.

Volunteers outside sorted beans from rice, canned juice from canned tuna.

Havens from Woodstock to the Iron Horse

By DAKKAN ABBE
Collegian Staff

Richie Havens
Iron Horse Music Hall
September 3, 1992

In our collective cultural memory, Woodstock looms like a parting of the Red sea, an unparalleled event where the scattered tribes were gathered and led to the other side by Hendrix, Joplin and others. Any one of the 500,000 plus attendees is guaranteed a rapt audience of grandchildren as they regale the young'uns with tales from the Woodside ("Then there was the day I took the brown acid and played pattycake with Joe Cocker for four hours.")

Cultural bonding aside, the truth is that much of the music at Woodstock was incredible and few of the artists who played there are still making music with the same intensity and power.

Those who have seen the movie or were actually there (check your pacemaker), can hardly forget the raw soul of Richie Havens singing "Motherless Child" to open the festival. Curling a massive thumb over the neck of his acoustic guitar, strumming like a freight train, and singing like a prophet, he quite simply blew away the crowd.

This last Thursday night Richie appeared in our very own Iron Horse in Northampton to a cozy hundred of his biggest fans. His balding head gave way to a thick ponytail in back, and a rich beard flowed from his face. Unbelievably, he actually looked younger than at Woodstock, and seemed to glow from head to toe (musta been the coffee).

Richie sat on a lone stool and spoke quietly but surely for several minutes before starting to play. As his silk-smooth strumming began, the room rose in excitement as we all waited to hear his voice. To those who have never heard his voice, no words will do, but Richie Havens is blessed with a singular voice that I can only compare to Stevie Wonder's best in beauty and soul-scratching intensity.

Richie's first few songs were achingly beautiful, but were mere teasers as he slowly brought his voice into its upper range where occasional sparks of electricity seemed to crackle in the air around him. The crowd was fantastic, fully appreciating the magic of seeing this man in such an intimate space.

For an hour and a half Richie sat alone, his left foot dancing madly to his brilliant and furious strumming (guitarists take note, he never solos), his voice filling every nook and cranny of the Iron Horse. Covering songs like "Here Comes the Sun" and "Time After Time" (Cindy Lauper!), and playing his numerous spiritually and politically charged originals, Richie was untouchable, a towering giant of a performer.

A second guitarist and pianist came on stage for the last hour and played tastefully and with restraint. They didn't take anything away from Richie, but neither could they have added much to this virtual holy man. (I'm not exaggerating — this was a minor religious experience for me).

He ended the show with "Motherless Child," wiped his brow of sweat, stepped back and clasping his hands together bowed to the audience, a beautiful and humble gesture from a man who has played for half a million people and seemed just as happy to play for a hundred. God bless you, Richie.

On the road, in lust and HIV positive

Mr. Lupo says The Living End is a brazenly politically incorrect road flick

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Longtime Companion this ain't. Jon (Craig Gilmore) and Luke (Mike Dytri) are HIV positive, in lust and hopelessly cynical. And they're on the run in what director Gregg Araki has called "a Hope/Crosby movie in which Crosby f—— Hope." The Living End is a brazenly politically incorrect take on the road flick with funny, tragic, yet mostly uneven results.

One of the highlights of this year's Boston Gay and Lesbian Film Festival, The Living End opens with a naive film critic named Jon (!) who learns he's HIV positive (the doctor adds an absent-minded 'sorry'). Jon picks up a ferociously handsome (and frequently shirtless) HIV positive drifter named Luke. After Luke kills a cop (not to mention clobbers a gay basher with a stereo), they go on the run because as he describes it: "What have we got to lose? We're completely free."

There's a definite sense of apocalyptic romanticism as Jon and Luke keep on running, have sex a lot and eventually fall in love. It's more of a symbolic journey than anything tangible, since nothing or no one seems to be chasing them except death. Jon, however, keeps in touch with Darcy (Darcy Marta), a friend from home whose life is falling apart due in part to Jon's absence.

Everything in The Living End is undercut with a sardonic, even caustic, edge. No doubt a point of controversy will be the wholly cartoonish portrayal of two men-hating killer lesbians Luke encounters. After he steals their car he comments "Don't these wenches listen to anything besides k.d. lang and Michelle Shocked?" This outrageous scenario, taken in the context of this film, is more hilarious than offensive.

In fact, all the characterizations (except for Darcy) are decidedly off-center. The leads are neither saintly gay martyrs (see TV's early AIDS drama An Early Frost) or maniacal villains (like Basic Instinct). Luke is the archetypal hunky stud, the guy just about anyone would fall hopelessly for. So much so that he wears his recklessness on his sleeve.

Jon, on the other hand, is playing-it-safe personified. His apartment, indeed his life, is awash in a sea of pop culture consciousness. While on the run, he tells Darcy to tell his editor he'll need an extension. He realizes that he's taking this whole "hackneyed romance thing" as just that. His HIV designation, in a way sets him free of his sheltered life, only to be left facing his mortality. Araki has a way of making this issues glide by the viewer without being first-film pretentious or preachy.

The Living End's miniscule budget ($25,000) adds as well as detracts from the film's power. While there are no panoramic vistas a la Thelma & Louise to undercut its intensity, there is little imagination in the way of camera work. All the shots are awkwardly staged and there is an insufferable amount of scenes with the back of the car pulling away from the camera.

What hurts the film most, however, is that both Craig Gilmore and Mike Dytri are terribly erratic actors. In one scene they're effective and even outstanding (the final exchange is fantastic), in another they're high schoolers in their first play. It also doesn't help that Dytri's boyish voice continually burst the drifter fantasy bubble every time he speaks. Much better is Darcy Marta, who gives a wonderful supporting performance that more than once outshines the leads.

The Living End works best when it's skewing stereotypes and being desperately romantic. But director Araki funnels a constant current of anger fun throughout this film. Stay for the credits and you'll see why. Araki is like Gus Van Sant (My Own Private Idaho) with a sharper edge but lacking the assured style. It's hard to tell what kind of director Araki will be, but by the title of his next film, "F the World," it's going to be very interesting to find out. Grade: B

WORK SMARTER. NOT HARDER.

Engineering student? Smart.
Math or science major? Also smart.

On tests, you probably run equations over again to make sure they're right. So you're working harder.

You don't have to do that anymore. Not when you use the TI-68 Advanced Scientific or TI-85 Graphics Calculator, with their last equation replay feature — and many other smart functions.

We've spent years with students like you and educators like your professors to develop the TI-68 and the TI-85. That's why they're so highly recommended.

For engineering students, the TI-68 solves up to five simultaneous equations, has complex number functions and offers formula programming.

The TI-85 builds on the power of the TI-68 by adding a wide range of graphing capabilities. Math students can handle calculus problems more easily. And technical students can see the functions for a better understanding of problems.

The TI-85 also handles complex numbers. Matrices. Vectors. Lists. Strings. Plus, it offers a powerful one-equation SOLVER.

Try a TI-68 or TI-85 at your local TI retailer today. And start working smarter. Instead of harder.

Many picked the Black Bears to finish among the bottom of the YanCon, but as it turns out Maine may be better than expected. The Black Bears beat heavily-favored UNH last week to open the YanCon schedule, and could find themselves moving into the middle of the YanCon standings.

9.Richmond: Jim Marshall hasn't had a winning season at Richmond yet, and could be seeing his tenure at Richmond come to an end with another losing campaign.

The Spiders return 11 starters from last year, most notably junior QB Greg Lilly, who should rewrite the Richmond record books by the time he graduates.

One bright spot for the Spiders is Jim Reid. The former UMass headman is now defensive coordinator and assistant head coach for Richmond, and could be wearing the headman's hat by next season.

SPORTS MEETING

Yup, it's that time of year again. The Massachusetts Daily Collegian sports staff is holding a meeting for all staff members at 7 p.m. tonight down at the Collegian. All are welcomed to attend. If you want to write for us, c'mon down! We're located in the 113 Campus Center Basement. To get here, come down the escalator and make a U-turn. We're on the opposite end of the basement from the ATMs.

SPORTS NOTICE

The Franklin County Soccer Association will sponsor recreational pick-up games, structured around the number of players on any given day. One week may accommodate 40 players by running two, full field games, and the next week run a round robin six-on-six to accommodate 15 to 20 players.

This program will run every Sunday from 4-6 p.m. The program will start September 13 and run through November 8, 1992. All games will be played behind the Greenfield High School, with parking available at Friendly's on Federal Street.

The FCSA, in pursuit of promoting soccer, will provide sponsorship, organization, and instruction. They ask that all players bring $1.00, along with a dark and white shirt. The FCSA will make available the fields, nets and officials, but the emphasis will be on everyone having fun. Bring your own water and please stretch out properly. For more information, call Brennan McGuane at 774-7257.

The Collegian – It's not just an adventure..... it's a job.

Come by and check out all the wonderful opportunities that await you.
We're located in the basement of the Campus Center on the opposite end than the ATM"s.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Expectations run high but the day moves slowly. Stay calm and collected. Although you may feel tired by afternoon, you will still be able to fulfill your duties.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Move ahead full steam with your plans. Discovery of a loophole in a contract will help you obtain funding. Remember gifts for a close relative who lives in the immediate area.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Speak up! Take the initiative at interviews and conferences important to your future. Real estate matters and domestic affairs go well. Avoid expensive business entertaining.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): A modest conventional approach will bring the best results no~:. Do not be too quick to accept a burden that someone wants to shift onto your shoulders. Dress well.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Many roads open up before you. Choose the path that gives you the variety you need. Travel is favored. Maintain solid business connections by making timely phone calls.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Give others the benefit of the doubt and you will emerge a winner. Close friends deserve a chance to know the real you. You will have your choice in romance.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Your affable manner or personal magnetism will get you the results you want in a financial or job matter. You can drive a hard bargain while shopping. Be more imaginative in romance.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): If you move fast and discuss a domestic complication openly, you can prevent things from getting out of hand. Let loved ones air their feelings without interruption.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Hold your fire this morning. You may not have all the facts. Suave and friendly persuasion will succeed where a brusque demand would antagonize. Do more to promote your ideas.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Do no become concerned if there is lot of talk; action is what really counts. You are beginning to realize that frugality is the best answer to recurring money worries.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Official restrictions or other powerful factors could lead to a setback this morning. With ingenuity, you will get around a seemingly insurmountable barrier. Be patient.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Continue with a project or campaign until fully satisfied with the results. A close encounter of the romantic kind leaves you with a warm glow. Be prepare for a pleasant surprise.

some sort of records before he leaves.

My choice as national champ? The Gators of Florida will come out as the champs after all the bowl smoke, no pun intended, is cleared.

Kudos goes out to Andre Agassi for taking home the Wimbledon title. Over the years, I haven't been a big Agassi fan, but that's slowly changing. It looks as though Agassi is starting to really grow up which is good to see. Now if we could just get him to cut his hair. . .

Staying on the tennis scene, it's sad to see the irreplaceable John Patrick McEnroe play in his final full year on the tour. Nobody on the tour today will be able to match Mcenroe's past artistry on the court and personality, good and bad, off the court.

Here's a plea to Dave Gavitt and the Celtics. Find a way to get Charles Smith from the Clippers. Smith can be an explosive performer both offensively and defensively, and would be the big third building block to go along with Reggie Lewis and Dee Brown.

Well, get ready for Crofts Phone Madness II. Last year the Madness debuted with a question concerning the NCAA championship. This year, the questioning will take place right here on campus with the question concerning the identity of the next Super Bowl champion.

Minutemen victorious over New Hampshire, 4-1

Men's soccer remains undefeated at 2-0

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

Randy Jacobs must believe in the old adage "save the best for last".

When the starting University of Massachusetts men's soccer team stepped on the field yesterday, the junior forward did not join them. While sitting on the sidelines with the rest of the UMass team, he hoped to see action once the game started.

"I sat the first half just to get pumped up for the second, and it did the job," said Jacobs.

Jacobs scored two goals in the second half for UMass, and helped defeat the University of New Hampshire by a score of 4-1. The only thing that stood in the way of a hat trick for Jacobs was UNH goalie Aaron Agrodnia, a junior co-captain, early in the second half.

His first goal at 67:48 of the second half put UMass ahead 3-1, as he angled a sharp shot into the goal. It was set up by good offensive movement by UMass, and seemed to knock UNH, which was without last season's leading scorer Ryan Leib, out of the game. Jacobs put the game out of reach for good later in the second half.

UNH tied the game at 1-1 with a goal by sophomore Mike Veneto, his second of the year for the Wildcats, unassisted at 15:24.

The goal by UNH would be the only one allowed by UMass goalie sophomore Mark Wolf. He had six saves in the victory.

"Good job by Wolfie. It was a solid performance by the entire team. We really needed it," said UMass head coach Sam Koch.

The Minutemen needed only one more score to pull ahead, and they broke the deadlock before the first half ended. The second goal by UMass was junior Todd Kylish's second of the young season, and was assisted by junior Justin Edelman.

"Justin is another really good player. He makes the offense go," said Koch.

UMass' final goal was Jacobs' second, at 78:13. He stole a pass from the sweeper, and took it in, faked out the UNH goalie, and shot the ball into the open net.

The game was very physical, and included a yellow card to a UNH player for roughing.

"UNH was a tough team. You have to expect that type of play from top teams, and I think we were ready for them," Koch said.

The victory over UNH puts UMass at 2-0, heading into Saturday's game at Garber Field against Temple University at 11 a.m.

"I'm happy with where we are at this point in the season. We are not totally ready for Temple, but we have a couple of days to work it out. We'll be fine. Two games, two wins. I can't complain about that," said Koch.

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN
Junior forward Tomas Johansson and the UMass men's soccer team beat UNH 4-1. The Minutemen play Temple at home Saturday.

Jack-of-all-trades returns with some random thoughts

I know that Mr. Morrissey has already filled the paper with his summer thoughts, but that is not going to stop me from doing some random thoughts of my own. Here come some personal perceptions, so get ready:

First and foremost, the Red Sox Jack Clark is the saddest individual to ever wear a Sox uniform, period. When Clark signed with the BoSox I thought it was a great signing. Now after 1 1/2 years of pathetic baseball and a pathetic bankruptcy filing, I think it's a disgrace.

Jeff
CROFTS

Any individual who can play a professional sport like baseball for 10-plus years and then file for bankruptcy deserves no sympathy, sorrow or respect. Instead, Clark deserves to see what it's like when you have to work too hard for too little and not vice versa.

What is going to happen to Clark? Well, first off, he's going to be cleared of all his debts and have his unpaid for, expensive toys (18 cars? Come on, Jack, that's so sad!) returned. The debts Clark cannot cover will be covered by we, the public.

The Sox will probably buy out Clark's contract and allow him to unfairly earn another absurd (although not as absurd as 8.5 mill the Sox gave him) amount of money. Hopefully Clark will learn the value of cashola and not make any more "bad business decisions." No sorrow for you Jack, you dunce!

Jim Baker of the Boston Herald recently challenged another disgraceful individual, the portly Ed Andleman of WEEI, to a fight. Serious or not, Baker is not the only one who has those sentiments. Jim, I'll go cow tipping with you anytime!

The latest rape allegations involving athletes is particularly disturbing. Twenty (count 'em, twenty!) Cincinnati Bengals have been fingered by a Seattle woman as gang-raping her in a Washington hotel in 1990.

Even if these allegations are not true, athletes of this stature have got to learn that they shouldn't put themselves in positions like that. It's common sense, plain and simple.

Jerome Bettis of Notre Dame is the scariest running back in college since Earl Campbell. Meanwhile, San Diego State has a great runner of its own in Marshall Faulk. Faulk shredded USC (sorry to my good friend Matt Burns, but my, how the mighty Trojans have fallen!) last week. After a brilliant freshman campaign, Faulk will be setting

Three teams fighting for YanCon title

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

With three teams (Delaware, New Hampshire and Villanova) sharing identical 7-1 records in 1991 and the same trio all making appearances in the Division 1-AA playoffs in '91, the Yankee Conference established itself as one of the premier conferences in Division 1-AA.

Look for much of the same in 1992, as Delaware, New Hampshire and Villanova look to continue their YanCon supremacy as all three cracked most preseason top 20 lists, with Villanova being rated as high as second in the nation in one poll.

Now for a look at the nine teams vying for the 1992 YanCon Beanpot, listed in predicted order of finish as selected by YanCon media.

1. Villanova: The Wildcats return 17 starters from last year's squad, (10-2, 7-1 in the YanCon) headed by All-American inside linebacker Curtis Eller, who anchors a 'Nova defense that led the nation with the fewest points given up per game last year and returns nine starters from '91.

Offensively, Villanova will look to senior quarterback Tom Columbo to lead the Wildcat's high powered offense, which led the YanCon with an average of 442 yards per game last season. Senior fullback Jeff Johnson looks to fill the big shoes of Pat Kennedy, who led the YanCon in scoring last season while finishing third in all-purpose yards behind Jerome Bledsoe and Barry Borassa.

Head coach Andy Talley's squad is a consensus pick to run away with the YanCon title, and should be a top contender in the national picture as well. Last year, Villanova bowed out to eventual champion Youngstown State 17-16 in the Division 1-AA playoffs.

2. Delaware: Head Coach Harold "Tubby" Raymond is back for his 27th year on the Newark, DE campus, along with 15 starters from last year's (10-2, 7-1) YanCon tri-champs.

Leading the Fighting Blue Hen attack will be senior QB Bill Vergantino, a first team All-Yankee conference selection last season, who led the Hens with 673 yards rushing last season. Also back for Delaware is 1991 YanCon rookie-of-the-year Daryl Brown at the fullback slot, who is Vergantino's favorite target from a year ago and Keita Malloy — a deep threat who earned second team All-YanCon last season.

Defensively, the Hens return nine starters from last year, including their entire front four. Headlining the Blue Hen defense is senior free safety Warren McIntire, a consensus 1991 first team All-American, who picked off a I-AA leading 11 passes last season.

Look for the Blue Hens to battle New Hampshire for second place in the YanCon, as road games at both Villanova and UNH could knock Delaware out of contention for the title.

3. New Hampshire: Barry Bourassa is back for his senior year at UNH, and clearly stands as the supreme offensive threat in the YanCon. A 1991 Kodak and Walter Camp All-American, Bourassa led the nation with 2,310 all-purpose yards last season.

Even with Bourassa, the Wildcats will find it nearly impossible to duplicate their campaign of a year ago, when UNH went 9-3 (7-1) while qualifying for the I-AA playoffs. Head coach Bill Bowes must replace two-year starter Matt Griffin at the QB slot, as well as 13 others from '91.

On the other side of the ball, UNH will look to its secondary for its strength, as well as second team All-YanCon defensive end Dwayne Gordon. The Wildcats must also replace All-American Dwayne Saab, who is playing professionally with the New England Patriots.

Coming into the season, many experts agreed that UNH would battle for the YanCon title. However, the Wildcats suffered a crushing blow in week one, losing a heartbreaker to a surprising Maine squad that was tabbed by many to finish at the bottom of the YanCon standings.

4. Connecticut: Coming off a 3-8 (2-6) campaign in 1991, and with starting QB Cornelius Benton and All-American wide reciever Mark Didio now gone, head coach Tom Jackson should have little to get excited about in Storrs this year.

Or should he? The Huskies return 14 starters from last year, and optimism abounds in Huskyland. Look for tight end Brian Kozlowski and flanker Alex Davis to cornerstone the Husky offense, which is now led by sophomore Tom DeSarno.

UConn returns eight starters on defense, lead by senior free safety Mark Chapman, who also handles the punt and kick returning duties for the Huskies.

5. Boston University: Dan Allen's Terriers could be the surprise team of the YanCon, after a relatively disappointing 4-7 (3-5) '91 campaign.

18 starters return from last years squad including nine on the offense, where Allen must replace second team All-YanCon running back Jay Hillman. The QB situation is clouded, with Walter Norton Jr. and Greg Moore fighting for the starting nod.

BU ranked fifth in the YanCon in defense last season, and look for the Terriers to have perhaps the strongest defense in the YanCon this season. Nine starters return, including senior linebacker Keith Dowd and junior strong safety Marc Fauci.

6.Rhode Island: Tony Squiutieri takes over in his first full season as the Rams QB, and the future looks bright in Kingston, RI.

Coach Bob Griffin returns 11 starters from a year ago, and although 1992 appears to be a rebuilding year for the Rams, this team could surprise some people in the YanCon.

Defensively, the Rams will be lead by their linebacking corps, where three of the four are returning starters. Leading this group is senior tri-captain Peter Doremus, who was a second team All- YanCon performer in 1990.

7.Massachusetts: See season preview in yesterday's edition of the Collegian.

8.Maine: The Black Bears haven't had a winning season since 1989, and 1992 should be no different.

Maine returns 11 starters from last season, including QB Emilio Colon, who was plagued by interception problems in Maine's running attack last year. Gone is Maine's all-time leading rusher Carl Smith and his 641 yards of a year ago.

Students weather storm

Two from UM survive havoc caused by Andrew

A sample of Hurricane Andrew's aftermath.

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

Summer was a blow-out for two University of Massachusetts students who were left with little food and no shelter after the wrath of Hurricane Andrew struck Miami, Florida Aug. 23.

"Everything my family owned got wiped out in the hurricane," said senior chemical engineering major Chris Collins. He said he estimated the damage to his family's two homes, boat, car and his uncle's travel agency to be close to $1,500,000.

"I saw a 50 foot house boat stuck in trees 300 yards from the ocean," said Chris Kephart, also a senior chemical engineering major. He said it would take many years and billions of dollars to get Miami in working order again.

According to the Boston Globe, President Bush is seeking $7.6 billion to aid the victims of the hurricane. Governor Lawton Chiles of Florida said the sum would not cover all the state's expenses. He said at least a billion dollars would be needed just to restore jobs.

Due to the massive destruction, Collins said it took him three hours to drive two miles. "Driving was almost impossible with no traffic lights or signs, huge cypress trees lying in the road and flooding up to three feet deep in some areas," he said.

Kephart, 22, said the power of the 160 mile per hour winds was unbelievable. "I saw holes in brick walls made from coconuts and fish lying on a driveway half a mile inland."

Food and water were extremely hard to come by because all the roads in and out of Miami were blocked, said Collins. "People were actually paying $20 for a gallon of water."

Since there was no gas or electricity, Collins said they couldn't cook any food. "My friend and I ate cold Spaghetti O's and thawed out meatballs with grey poupon mustard."

Kephart said the one bright spot in this disaster was the way everybody pulled together to help one another out. Everybody was homeless and unemployed so there was no class distinction, he said. "There was no black, brown or white. Everyone became a shade of gray."

Collins, 24, described a situation in which a grocery store owner offered anything in his store for free. In another instance six people got out of their cars to move a tree that was blocking the road, he said.

Custodians said to be protesting staff reductions

By TAMI MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

Janitors responsible for maintaining the Campus Center and Student Union complex have been calling in sick to protest what they cite as poor working conditions do to understaffing.

Sources within Building Operations, the agency in charge of Campus Center maintenance said only two janitors were scheduled to clean the building Wednesday night and both called in sick and several janitors scheduled to work yesterday also called in sick.

"They are so exhausted at this point they can't take it any more."

Forrest Davies
Senior Building Services Manager

"They just can't take it anymore," said a Building Operations employee who asked to remained unnamed. "They're stressed-out and fatigued and it's going to get worse now that the school has started."

Senior Building Services Manager Forrest Davies would not confirm reports that employees were calling in sick to protest poor working conditions, but he did say the janitors have good reason to be upset.

"We spent this summer cleaning the building with seven people," said Davies. "They are so exhausted at this point they can't take it anymore."

"This is a problem that began about three years ago," Davies said. He said at that time when workers resigned or were transferred, his office was not permitted to fill the positions with permanent workers and could only hire non-union personnel.

According to Davies, as this practice increased the union complained and forced the University to stop hiring non-union workers, also known as 0-3 workers.

Davies said he had been promised he would get the 0-3s back this semester, but that when he put in a request with Human Resources it was denied.

Davies said he then put a request in with his supervisor, Ashoke Ganguli, director of Auxiliary Services, for eight permanent positions. He said that although this request was also denied, they were able to agree on three new permanent positions.

Ganguli and Robert Garstka, director of the office of Human Resources could not be reached for comment.

Davies said he would have to transfer some people onto the night shift and supplement the day shift with student workers.

"I don't know what we'll do," Davies said.

Low turnout expected in next week's primary

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — Only about one-fourth of the state's voters will cast ballots in next week's primary, Secretary of State Michael Connolly predicted Thursday.

Connolly released statistics showing that the number of registered Democrats dropped slightly from the March presidential primary, while Republican voters increased a bit. "Unenrolled" remained the favorite of most registered voters.

Overall, 3.11 million voters registered to vote in the primary. In March, 3.17 million registered.

More than 1.41 million voters registered as "unenrolled," down slightly from March's total of 1.44 million.

In 1990, 1.55 million people voted in the Democratic and Republican primaries, when races for governor, lieutenant governor, treasurer and U.S. senator were raging. That was about 50 percent of the registered voters, Connolly said.

"I'm cutting that right in half," Connolly said, projecting that voter turnout would be about 25 percent.

Now, there are 1.27 million registered Democrats, down from 1.26 million in March, Connolly said, 426,883 Republican voters, up from 425,444 in March. In the Independent Party, which has candidates in three congressional races and a few local elections, had 4,338 registered voters, compared to 1,204 in March.

With no statewide campaigns, voter turnout in next week's primaries will depend on the 10 congressional races and Statehouse contests.

Connolly predicted, however, that with a heated race between President Bush and Democrat Bill Clinton, voter registration and turnout for the Nov. 3 general election "will break all records."

Turnout "could be better than 80 percent" in November, and "may even run as high as 85 percent," he said.

Connolly predicted high primary turnout in the 3rd, 5th, 6th and 10th districts, where incumbent Reps. Joseph Early, Chester Atkins, Nicholas Mavroules and Gerry Studds all face stiff competition

Iran to build reactors

China, Russia to sell Iran technology

By RUTH SINAI
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Russia and China have agreed despite U.S. objections to sell nuclear reactors and technology to Iran, a combination of U.S. and Iranian officials said Thursday.

Iranian President Hashemi Rafsanjani, on a visit to Beijing, confirmed that China had agreed to sell his country the makings of a 300-megawatt reactor for "peaceful" purposes. He gave no details.

Russia has agreed to sell Iran two 440-megawatt reactors and to provide some 170 technicians to install and operate it, said the People's Mujahedeen of Iran, the largest anti-government opposition movement.

A Bush administration official said the deal likely will be announced Sept. 21. The official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the United States had sought to dissuade the Russians from completing the deal.

"We're concerned about the political sybolism of such a deal," he said. "It's not that we think the reactors mean Iran will have bombs in five years," the offical added.

Even if the reactors were transferred tomorrow, he added, it would take years for them to begin work.

Russia, China and Iran all insist that the reactors and related technology are designed to produce nuclear power. U.S. officals say Iran plans to produce nuclear weapons and could easily convert the plants to military use.

The United States had urged China to reject the Iranian nuclear deal.

Chinese officials insisted that the reactor was non-military. They pointed out that earlier this year they signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty which bars the transfer of nuclear technology for military use.

Iran had been seeking two 300-megawatt reactors from China, and it was unclear why it didn't get both.

Auto insurance laws challenged

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — A consumer advocate and two senior citizen groups urged the Legislature on Thursday to overhaul Massachusetts' auto insurance laws so premiums won't go up next year.

Harvey Rosenfield, the leader of a successful referendum drive in California to lower insurance rates, the Massachusetts Association of Older Americans and the American Association of Retired Persons joined in the call for legislative action.

They made their plea at a sparsely attended rally on the Statehouse steps.

Rosenfield urged the Legislature to pass a bill recommended by its Insurance Committee that would scrap no-fault auto insurance and return to a system where the courts determined blame in accidents and only the innocent victim got reimbursed.

"It would get rid of the no-fault cash cow that allows insurance companies to soak the people of Massachusetts," Rosenfield said.

But in an interview later, Insurance Commissioner Kay Doughty said studies by insurance experts have shown there would not be any cost savings under the committee bill.

Doughty is backing a bill sponsored by Gov. William F. Weld that would strengthen no-fault insurance.

Under no-fault, victims are paid by their own insurance companies for medical expense and lost wages.

Under the system advocated by Rosenfield, called a tort system, people injured in accidents file lawsuits, a jury determines who was at fault, and the insurance company of the at-fault driver pays the injured parties.

Rosenfield contended insurance companies favor no-fault because it allows them to collect more premiums, which they then invest to generate income.

But Doughty said Weld's proposal, which would eliminate lawsuits for less serious injuries, would lower rates while there was no guarantee returning to a tort system would do so.

Doughty said Massachusetts' present system is a hybrid, no pure no-fault, since it allows law suits for pain and suffering any time an injury results in medical bill of $2,000 or more.

The Weld plan would eliminate the dollar threshold and instead spell out the types of injuries for which suits would be allowed.

The bill endorsed by the Insurance Committee is now pending before the House Ways and Means Committee.

Because of the lack of consensus on the issue, no plan may make it through the Legislature before the 1992 session ends.

Students shocked by textbook prices

Publishing companies plead high costs

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Correspondent

"Outrageous!" exclaims senior Jen Clary, civil engineer major. "The [book publishing] companies must be making quite a profit off students."

And who wouldn't agree as UMass students journey to the Textbook Annex to spend a fortune on this semester's books?

But why are the books so expensive? In the coming weeks, many students will pay hundreds of dollars for required texts, often for only a few classes

Every time a used book is resold, it causes the price of a new book to rise. Sylvia Bonadio, a representative from Macmillan Publishing Co., explains that her company prints a certain number of books to be sold over a certain amount of time.

However, if the initial books bought are resold, then the new books just sit on the shelf and eventually cost the company money. Publishing is not a profitable business," says Charles Baker, a representative from the Houghton Mifflin Company.

The revenue from the sale of a textbook goes towards other "advertising items," such as transparencies given to professors at no cost, as well as free books for TA's and professors, said Baker.

Another costly factor for publishers is the graphics and color added to the book.

"A professor figures students will read a colorful textbook," Bonadio says. So publishers are pressured to make splashy, exciting books with high visual appeal to compete in the market.

Even the Textbook Annex staff claims that they don't make a profit off the students. "Contrary to popular belief, we don't mark up the books," says a Textbook Annex representative. "When we get the books from the publishing companies, we actually mark down the books between 5 to 10 percent."

In the cut-throat textbook business, no one seems to be claiming to be making any sort of profit off the sales. Still, students are still paying between $30 and $100 for a new book.

"Professors are sympathetic about how expensive books are," explains Sue, a senior anthropology major. In order to save the students money, many professors are leaving books on reserve and also copying different articles to form a reader with the necessary materials.

By using a reader instead of buying all the books, students have only the articles relevant to the particular class instead of having a whole book and only using a chapter of it, she said.

However, the reader is only useful in a class that requires a number of different sources for pieces of information. This is not very practical for a math or engineering course, she said.

With no hope in sight for cheaper textbooks, students can only try to cut costs through used books or by sharing books.

An anonymous senior natural resource major sums up what a lot of flustered students are probably thinking once they realize how much they will be forking over for their required books.

Orientation week held for incoming Black students

By MARTIN F. JONES
Collegian Staff

The Malcolm X Cultural Center in cooperation with the department of Academic Support Services hosted a special orientation this week for incoming African-American students, welcoming them to the University.

Kim Edwards, a staff member in the department of Academic Support Services, helped to coordinate the orientation, which had been planned and organized over the summer by upperclassmen from the Black community.

"We didn't feel the new students had enough contact with the upperclassmen," said Edwards. "We wanted to provide a program to allow the freshmen to meet the upperclassmen and show our support for them."

The program began earlier this week with an ice cream social and dance at the Malcolm X Center following the annual opening day convocation for new students.

"The Real Deal. . . What it's All About," a program consisting of skits and discussions addressing issues pertinent to the community was held Tuesday. The program discussed, among other topics, date rape, self-respect and courtesy among peers, academic responsibility and AIDS.

On Wednesday, an informational fair was held to introduce new students to the various resources and student groups available to them. Representatives were present from the department of Afro-American Studies, Collegiate Committee for Education of Black and other Minority Students, Nommo News, Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity, Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority, Iota Phi Theta Fraternity, Delta Sigma Theta Sorority, Haitian American Students Association, Cape Verdean Student Alliance, African Students Association, Sylvan Cultural Center, Martin Luther King Cultural Center, Malcolm X Cultural Center, National Society of Black Engineers, and the UMass Black Student Union.

UMass honor society chapter takes award

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

The "Most Improved Award" was recently presented to members of University of Massachusetts chapter of annual Golden Key National Honor Society at the August national convention awards banquet in Arizona.

The advisor and three student representatives of the university chapter, Kerri Beal, Maura Canavan and the president of the chapter Joseph Molito accepted the award.

"I'm delighted and very excited for the students that work hard," said the advisor of the university chapter Gladys Rodriguez. "I want to see the Golden Key Chapter be a name on campus."

The university chapter was one out of the ten chapters to receive an award, out of the 180 chapters at universities across the country.

Golden Key National Honor Society is a non-profit, academic honors organization which provides academic recognition, leadership opportunities and scholarships.

There are 180 chapters across the United States and Puerto Rico, and membership into the Society is by invitation only to the top 15 percent of juniors and seniors. The university chapter was started in 1986.

"We have different activities and encourage students to continue academic involvement in activities for the community at large," said Rodriguez.

The Most Improved Chapter Award is presented to chapters that have been active for more than one full school year and have most dramatically improved their level of chapter activity and member participation.

All Golden Key chapters may apply for this national award, but only a few universities are deemed outstanding enough to receive this honor.

Last semester, Rodriguez said the society sponsored successful activities which turned out to be major achievements, such as the Best of America Program which provided a Spanish program in Holyoke encouraging students to make the right choice.

During the holiday season, the chapter also visited the Amherst Nursing Home, delivering cakes and food and singing Christmas carols. They also sponsored a sophomore recognition reception to invite and encourage sophomores into the chapter.

Rodriguez said in a given year the chapter has about 1,000 members. Last year, about 600 new members were inducted. Initiation for new members will be held in November. Golden Key Chapter awareness days will be held Oct. 12, 13 and 14.

Senate race heats up; many to run unopposed

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — Most Republican Senate incumbents are unopposed in the Sept. 15 primary and looking toward the Nov. 3 election in which they hope to protect strong Republican gains two years ago.

Meanwhile, several Democratic state Senate primary races have been hotly contested.

Two years ago, the GOP broke the Democrats' stronghold on the Senate. Republicans picked up seven seats, giving them control of 16 of 40 seats — enough to uphold a veto from Republican Gov. William Weld. Since then, the GOP lost one seat in a special electin, dropping their strength to 15, still above the one-third level needed to sustain a veto.

"We view the importance of the Senate as crucial to the govrenor's abilities to promote his policies," said Alan Safran., executive director of the state Republican Party. "This is a war for the ability of this governor to govern over the next two years."

Lowell Republican Sen. Nancy Anchin Sullivan is not seeking re-election. No Republicans are on the 1st Middlesex ballot, but Mary Burns and Jean-Marie Mclean are waging sticker campaigns for the nomination.

Of the remaining 14 GOP senators, none have primary challengers, a phenomenon Safran said demonstrates party unity but state Democratic Pary head Steven Grossman said reflects a narrow GOP tendency to stifle debate and "anoint" a candidate.

Meanwhile, some Democratic senatorial primaries have generated sensational headlines.

Sen. Bill Owens, who represents Boston's minority neighborhoods, faces competition from three candidates, including local NAACP vice president, Diane Wilkerson. Their campaigns have turned nasty at times, and Wilkerson withdrew from the endorsement process of the Black Political Task Force, claiming Owens had stacked the membership to get the endorsement.

Paula Childs, a former television reporter and advocate for tougher drunken driving laws, and former prosecutor Cheryl Jacques are vying to take on Senate Republican Leader David Locke in November.

Jacques took Childs to task for failing to list stocks and other assets in two family trust funds. Later, Jacques made hay with a tenuous connection between Locke, of Wellesley, and a law partner accused of billing large legal fees to a charity trust.

A third Democrat, lawyer J. Joseph Lydon, is running a low-key campaign.

And Boston City Councilor Maura Hennigan Casey and Rep. Marian Walsh of West Roxbury are seeking the nomination to face rookie Sen. Christopher Lane, R-Medfield.

Whitmore games send education program to early grave

The Upward Bound program at the University has been in existence for the last 25 years. It is a federally funded educational program, utilized by high school students in the Amherst, Holyoke, Pittsfield, North Adams and Springfield areas. The program caters to low income and/or first generation college-bound high school students who demonstrate the potential to improve academically.

During the school year students are provided with counseling, tutorial services and instruction in learning skills at high schools, community centers and area colleges. The students receive counseling in college, career and financial aid planning and participate in enrichment activities. They also take part in a six-week intensive academic program housed at the University.

Unfortunately, the Upward Bound program has been defunded. The students in the program have basically been abandoned by the University and the employees have been left jobless. As students we need to be cognizant of how UMass operates politically. We must be aware of how the Office of Academic Support Services, which oversaw the program, duped the student body back in May and showed a great deal of unprofessionalism in dealing with this program.

The University received word that the program would no longer be funded on May 8, 1992 but withheld the information from the students of the program, the employees and the campus community until May 27, three days before the program's funding ended and ironically, after school was dismissed. It seems as if this information was withheld purposely to prevent the student body from protesting yet another issue. Not only was the information withheld, but it also seems as if the grant proposal to refund the program for another three-year cycle was sabotaged.

One might wonder why a program which existed for 25 years was suddenly defunded. In fact, 25 years of experience suggests the proposal that was submitted should have been above and beyond the expectations and the guidelines of the grant.

Malkes
GOMEZ

Many parts, including statistical information, were copied from a proposal written in 1982. This seems to show a lack of knowledge or carelessness in grant proposal writing, especially since the Office of Institutional Research and Planning is housed at UMass. In fact, former Dean of Academic Support Services Anna Quinley, under the auspices of the Vice Chancellor who in turn works under the auspices of the Chancellor, stated, "Obviously we did not do the best job in writing the proposal that we could have."

It also seems as if there was tampering of federal funds. There is a question about where the director's and secretary's salaries went last year. The program has been without a secretary for over a year and without a director for over a year and a half; therefore, this money should have been accounted for. Although there was a part-time person from Whitmore acting as director, it is illegal to pay this person with federal funds because this person, rarely in the Upward Bound office, already held a full-time paying position in Academic Support Services.

Obviously something in this picture is just not right. In fact, the list of injustices could continue to be sighted and the Campus Pond could probably not hold them all. But that is not the point. The point is the administration of this school must learn that they will have to be more responsible for their actions, as well as for the political games that have been played. The administration must answer to the students. After all, we pay their salaries and this is our school. Therefore, we need to be treated with respect in our "home."

As students we must request that the University find a way to fund the program for the next three years, until a proposal can be written to start another Upward Bound program. After all, the University received an extra $10 million this semester. It is our duty as students, especially students of color, to get involved with trying to get the program back since a great deal of brothers and sisters utilized this program. We should insist that the Department of Education hold an official investigation, which can be done by writing them in Washington, D.C.

It is time UMass is run by the students and for the students. We should have input on all the decisions made on campus. We should not find out about these decisions months later. If we let these issues go unnoticed, the University bureaucrats will continue to do things without our input. The students are the key to changing this University. As Malcolm X said, "Change must be made, by any means necessary."

A list of people and addresses to write to complain about this great injustice is available in the New Africa House Library.

Malkes Gomez is a UMass student.

Family search yields self

The Summer of 1992. It was probably a lot like last summer for most college students. But for me, the Summer of 1992 was the summer that I truly found myself.

I am adopted. If the University of Massachusetts is indeed a microcosm of society, there are about 300 other students here who are also adopted. This summer, after searching for nearly two years, I found my natural mother and my full-blooded brother.

Luke
ERICSON

The search began rather auspiciously in the summer of 1990. Posing as the son of alumni, I went to the college my birth father attended and convinced secretaries at their alumni and records office to look up my birth father as a "friend my parents have lost touch with."

I was armed with only my birth father's surname, which was my own until I was legally adopted, and his date of birth, which I found on a letter from my social worker to my parents. With a little luck and charm, I got his first name and date of graduation.

My next clue came when someone told me that a person's name and address is public record in certain circumstances, unless he or she pays to have it removed. I used this fact in one last effort to get my birth father's address from the corresponding state agency.

After driving past his home, which turned out to be less than 20 miles from my hometown, and writing two letters explaining my desire to meet him, I finally met my birth father in January 1991. We talked for an entire afternoon. He introduced me to his second wife (my birth mother was his first) and his two children, who are my half-brother and half-sister and are much younger. Since then I have called, written or visited every couple of months and let him know how my life is going. We both seem very comfortable with such an arrangement.

This time I used the prescribed legal avenues, rather than "by hook or crook" methods I used finding my birth father. I wrote to the Massachusetts Department of Social Services, the agency through which I was adopted, and asked for assistance in finding my birth mother.

They responded with all the warmth of a drill sergeant. I completed two release-of-information forms and made between 15 and 20 phone calls. With the speed of a runaway glacier, DSS finally came through for me in April of this year.

Once I got the call, I became extremely anxious but it would be another two months before I would get any closer. I learned that my birth mother had been trying to contact me since 1989, but by the time they reached my parents, I was off to college and my mother told them no. I made an appointment with a social worker to go over my file and read the letters my birth mother had written to DSS. I have to add that despite my consternation with DSS, that social worker was a true professional and extremely efficient.

I knew the reunion would be happy, for my birth mother's letters were filled with anxiousness and hope. Finally, in June, I drove the short 60 miles and met my birth mother.

The first visit was quite short, but very sweet because it held a surprise even I could not have anticipated. She had found my brother just three weeks before we met. I was able to leave him a letter at his job the same day I met my birth mother.

I grew up knowing my birth mother had had a second son who was adopted separately, but I wasn't sure if he had the same father. It only took one look at his picture to see we were full-blooded brothers.

Within two days, my brother called me and we talked on the phone for two and a half hours. It was a $17 phone call. After 20 years of being the youngest, I was suddenly an older brother.

Even though we grew up in different states, we are so much the same: we like much of the same music, sports and entertainment. This fall I'll be hanging out at his college on a couple of weekends and he'll be up here as well.

I began this column with "I have found myself" and, though it may seem trite, there's hardly a better way to put it. I don't have to answer "I don't know — I was adopted," anymore. I know who I am, where I came from, and why.

The entire experience has drawn me closer to my family, not further apart. I have spent long hours talking with my parents about my adoption and why things turned out the way they did. I launched my search out of curiosity, not dissatisfaction with my parents or my family.

If there's any advice I can give, perhaps it is what I said to the parents of an adopted child who approached me after I told my church congregation my good news: never lie to your children about their adoption, but do insist they put off searching for their roots until they're ready, usually after high school.

In retrospect, I find that that's almost the same advice my mother gave me whenever I asked about it when I was younger, which I guess proves that I am indeed my mother and father's son, maybe not genetically, but definitely emotionally, psychologically and spiritually — that's what makes them "real" and that's all that should ever matter.

Looking for future when Year of Woman uneeded

Finally, I've registered to vote.

Hmmm. All this voting power, and what to do? Well, I am a female in the Year of the Woman — and you know what that means. Maybe. I'm not too clear on it. I'm not sure I even want it. I'll try to explain.

I met an older man this summer where I worked. He was always very kind — a gentleman, and that was what bothered me. He had two sets of manners: one for the men, one for the women. His conversations with females were filled with compliments and flattery, and he was very careful to avoid "unpleasant" topics.

Darienne
HOSLEY

Whenever we spoke, he always asked about my perspective as a female. I was asked how I felt about abortion, women involved with politics, the candidates' wives, etc. Not once did he ask my views on the economy, the presidential candidates, foreign affairs. Those were his topics, and when I started to say something, he'd ask me about a "women's issue."

There won't be real progress until women's issues become everybody's issues, my aunt told me. She's right.

Men argue just as passionately about abortion as women do. They have a different perspective, but their points are valid. It's their issue too. Women in Congress have the same decision-making power as men do. Another shared issue. And the candidates' wives? A candidate's wife or husband has a great deal of influence over that person. An issue.

I want women to be more involved in politics. I want women in top leadership positions in the community, the state, the country. But I will not vote for any candidates based on their gender or their stand on the so-called women's issues. My vote will be based on a larger picture.

Everyone knows men and women aren't the same. But I'm tired of looking for differences and distinctions where there don't need to be any.

The Year of the Woman already has me feeling burned out. Overcompensation after years of being undervalued won't make women a legitimate force in politics. When gender is no longer a sticky point, then women are truly a part of the process. And that will take more time than a year.

What happens when "The Year" is over? After the elections comes the post-game wrap-up: analysis, conclusions and on to the next big thing. And in that analysis, there's room for failure. The professional experts have the power to reflect on the campaign rhetoric and dismiss the "Year of the Woman" as just that: one year, over and done. Trends are sad things. The Year of the Woman could find itself in an old storeroom with all the "Perot '92" posters.

Women don't share equal status with men. I know that. And there's still a need for change — big change. But I can't believe that the overhyped "Year of the Woman" is making that structural change.

I would like to be hired for a job because I'm the best candidate — not the best female candidate. I would like to sulk and grouch without someone commenting, "Ah, PMS." I would like to be able to go for a walk alone late at night without being afraid of shadows.

I would like to stop myself from making generalizations about "all men," or "all women." I would like to accept help from a man as easily as I would from a woman, without worrying that I was fulfilling a stereotype.

I don't want the course of my life steered by a Y-chromosome.

Darienne Hosley is a Collegian columnist.

We're looking for the artist in you

So you're a college student but you don't think you can write 70 lines of brilliant analysis worthy of the time of 19,000 people?

That's okay.

You can draw pictures.

Find yourself an 8 1/2 by 11 piece of white paper, some felt tip pens or markers and start doodling! But don't touch the ballpoints — they look terrible.

A little bit of artistic talent is always a plus, but creativity and a point are essentials.

When your masterpiece is finished, drop it off at the Collegian office, 113 Campus Center basement. Leave your name and phone number too, please — if we like your stuff, we'll call you back for more!

"Neighbors who just used to wave to each other on their way to work became really good friends," said Kephart, who lives in Key West, Florida.

Collins said looting was a problem for many people. In one situation he saw six men in the process of loading a moving van with things from a warehouse being stopped by the police. "My uncle had to loot his own house to protect any valubles he had left."

Kephart said he was worried when he bagan shifting through all the rubble and trying to make sense of the destruction. "I was hoping I wouldn't be pulling dead bodies out."

People are in awe of the whole situation, said Kephart. "After the hurricane everybody just kept asking, 'Where do I start?'."

"It was very depressing to see the hurricane wipe out in eight hours what took some people 30 years to build," said Collins.

Thursday's figures included 288 people registered to other parties, such as the Green Party, the Libertarian Party and the Socialist Party.

Suffolk County, with 262,587 registered voters, had the highest concentration of Decmocratic voters, with 61.8 percent, while Republican registration was at 7.9 percent.

Barnstable County, with 119,873 registered voters, tallied the highest concentration of GOP voters, with 21.9 percent. Still, Democrats outnumbered Republicans there, with 25.2 percent. Voters have until Oct. 6 to register for the November election.

Connolly said the Independent Party must receive 3 percent of the November vote to remain a viable political party in the state.

No pagent for Madonna

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. (AP) — Madonna could never be Miss America because she lacks "wholesome" image it takes to be crowned, the pageant's director says.

"Madonna is certainly not someone we would even want to be a role model for our program," Leonard C. Horn, chairman of the Miss America Organization, said in an interview Wednesday.

"I think the image she projects is definitely unwholesome."

To compete for the Miss America title, a woman must be an American citizen, 26 years old or younger, single and must never have been pregnant.

"We're looking for wholesome young women," Horn said. "Miss America is the visualized American maiden."

The pageant defines "wholesome" as a woman who loves her country, is physically attractive, intelligent, articulate, feminine, glamourous, ambitious, educated and has specific career goals.

Madonna's spokeswoman, Liz Rosenberg of Warner Records in New York, was not available for comment.

Donna Puluka, president of the New Jersey Chapter of the National Organization for Women, said the pageant's requirements are offensive to women.

"It further confirms our feeling that the Miss America Pageant puts women into this one, set category and . . . if you are outside of this mold in any way, you don't fit in," Paluka said.

■ orientation

Senior Debora Ferreira, academic coordinator for the Malcolm X Center, designed the informational fair to show new students there will be support groups to assist them with adjusting to university life.

"It is important that they know who to trust and who the role models in the community are," said Ferreira. She also added that the informational fair allowed the new students to meet them in a relaxed atmosphere.

The orientation ended with a "New Student Barbecue" held Thursday evening outside the cultural center. The overall response by the new students was fairly positive.

"It was very educational," said Rick Ruler of Dorchester. "It got people united and I met a lot of new people."

Ibrahim Ali of Springfield said the orientation was "very informative" and "productive."

Boston native Nancy Morency said the upperclassmen were "very friendly," and described the skits as "very informative."

"The orientation was great," she said. "On a scale of one to 10, I'd give it a nine."

Prison health care under fire

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Outside physicians who reviewed health facilities at the state's women's prison clashed with Department of Correction officials Thursday over the best way to monitor health care in the prison system.

Both sides debated the issue at a Statehouse meeting called by a special House committee established to investigate health care at MCI-Framingham. The physicians were asked to review the health care system following the death of an inmate, Robin Peeler, in February.

Dr. Gordon Josephson, one of three physicians who issued a report highly critical of health care in state prisons earlier this month, said he was concerned that ongoing assessments by a national health care group will not be adequate to guarantee high quality health care. He suggested that an independent review panel keep an eye on progress.

"Right at this point in time there is a feeling for a need for the public to participate in that process," Josephson said.

Two other doctors — Dr. Roxane Ritter of Beth Israel Hospital and Dr. Barbara Herbert of Boston City Hospital — also participated in the review.

To meet Gov. William F. Weld's goal of handing public services over to private companies, the Department of Correction this year contracted with a private company, Emergency Medical Services Associates (EMSA), to run the prison health system.

Doyle Moore, assistant to the commissioner of DOC, said EMSA is only bound in its contract with the state to met accreditation standards set by the National Commission on Correctional Health Care (NCCHC).

"That's the level we felt comfortable with," Moore said. "It's all that would hold up in court."

The most recent NCCHC review at MCI-Framingham, which took place in July, noted improvements in a number of areas, including speed in delivering medical care and documentation of services.

Peeler, 32, was infected with the AIDS virus. Questions were raised about delays in the emergency response the night she died. Another inmate, Donna Jean Hamilton, 31, committed suicide in May after she was put in a cell alone, although she had threatened to kill herself.

Dr. Mark Prete, medical director for EMSA, said it would welcome further reviews by the physicians. "If they're volunteering to come in, we'd be happy to have them," he said.

Prison officials called the physicians' report outdated, saying changes have already been made to address problems in the report. They also disputed the report's conclusion that some prison guards deny health services to inmates to punish them.

Moore asked whether the allegation about prison guards could be substantiated, saying prisoners frequently make such allegations without cause.

Josephson acknowledged there were limits to the doctors' ability to check prisoner accounts, but said he had approached the reports with skepticism. "I've worked in emergency medicine 15 years," he said. "I wasn't born in a pumpkin patch."

Tutu resigns from Harvard post

ASSOCIATED PRESS
Archbishop Desmond Tutu

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — Anglican Archbishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa has resigned from the Harvard University Board of Overseers, citing political turmoil in his homeland.

Tutu submitted his resignation, effective immediately, in a letter to President Neil L. Rudenstine, university officials announced Thursday.

His term on the board, one of the university's two governing bodies, would have expired in 1995.

"The situation in my home country is volatile in the extreme and very fluid, requiring that many of us should be more available to help in the delicate but exhilarating business of being midwives for the birth of the much-awaited new South Africa," Tutu wrote.

In October, Tutu will speak at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Tutu won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1984 for his efforts to end apartheid, the system of racial segregation in South Africa. Black and white leaders in that country have been trying to resume power-sharing talks interrupted by violence that has killed more than 60 blacks since June.

Rudenstine praised Tutu's contributions to the world and to the university.

"We thank him for what he has done and we accept his resignation with the greatest regret," Rudenstine said. "However, we fully understand and respect his decision to concentrate his energies entirely on the great challenges that are being faced by his country at this time."

Tutu, who was awarded an honorary degree from Harvard in 1979, has been a member of the Board of Overseers since 1989.

The 30-member board, elected by alumni, advises and approves important actions of the other governing board, the Harvard Corporation. Both boards must approve major teaching and administrative appointments.

Guitar duo promotes Illicit compact disc

Tribal Tech to perform at the Iron Horse

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Catastrophe, coincidence, and a lot of hard traveling have brought Tribal Tech to the Iron Horse tonight. Tribal Tech, composed of the highly acclaimed Scott Henderson ("ascendant Jazz/rock guitar god") and self taught bassist Gary Willis, have a special story behind their latest album Illicit.

"We were recording in Hollywood during the riots, on Thursday about mid-afternoon," explains Willis. "Across the street a gang of people showed up and busted through the windows in an attempt to loot the place. The owners of the studio got up on their roof with Israeli assault rifles and fired a few shots in the air.

"We have a core audience of musicians who appreciate us, and we are not going to change our music to reach more people."
Gary Willis

"We figured the safest place to be was in the studio, and there was nothing left for us to do. So we jammed."

The result of that uniquely circumstanced jam session was the two best cuts off of the new album, "Riot" and "Aftermath."

Touring to support their new album has proven to be a tough life, especially for musicians used to a more nocturnal circuit than the morning radio show they played on, AM Buffalo, earlier this week.

"It's hard to sound good on a show like that. I don't know where they found this audience of 25 people. Half of it was kids," laments Willis. "But we like to play."

Their rigorous tour included a flight to Italy for three gigs. The Collegian got a hold of Tech on their first day off in two weeks, not even recuperated from their jet lag.

"We will be touring Europe twice a year now, and making enough time at home to write," says Willis.

The last time Willis played in Northampton it was on his birthday. "It's always a fun gig," says Willis.

"We have a core audience of musicians who appreciate us, and we are not going to change our music to reach more people. We are crusading against 'happy jazz' and there is too much awful stuff under the label of fusion. The only way to get heard is with more airplay, but we have way too many chords for rock radio. We're aiming for college radio now."

Tribal Tech's fifth album, Illicit, is their first for Bluemoon Recordings. The band's slant toward rock oriented jazz is definitely more evident than ever.

Henderson describes the band's philosophy: "What we're trying to do is orchestrate the music, via modern technology, to make a four piece band sound like a mini orchestra, but we're still holding on to the sensitivity of an old fashioned jazz group and the go-for-the-throat energy of a rock band."

Tribal Tech's tremendous twosome has toured with great musicians like Chick Corea, Joe Zawinul, Wayne Shorter and Jean-Luc Ponty, but they are no longer sidemen.

"We're tired of playing other people's music," says Willis. "We try not to formalize what we do — we run against the jazz traditions. We come from the compositional side with more emphasis on melody," says Willis. "The hardest thing to do is to write a melody people can remember."

Scott Henderson and Gary Willis started talking after one of Willis' performances in Los Angeles, and decided to jam together.

"I didn't know this guy from anybody," says Willis. "We've had a band ever since. It's been fate and a lot of hard work. We're still in the middle of giving [Tribal Tech] a shot."

In 1991, Henderson was named by Guitar World as the #1 Jazz Guitarist, and in January 1992, he was named #1 in Guitar Player's Annual Reader's Poll. Bass Player recently referred to Willis as "one of the most vital bass voices of the 90s."

Tribal Tech's performance at the Iron Horse begins at 7 p.m. tonight.

Collegian puts the spotlight on theatre student

Takes a closer look at the Amherst world of acting

By CUTTER GARCIA
Collegian Correspondent

The following is the Collegian*'s attempt to get up close and personal with the University of Massachusetts Arts and Living crowd of students who are working hard and making an difference.*

The following is an interview with Rob Corddry, this weeks pick from the Theatre Department.

CG:Can you tell us a little bit about your status here at UMass?

RC:I'm 21. I'm an English/Theater major. I'm from Weymouth, and I've been here at UMass for three years now. I'm a senior but I plan on being here as long as it takes, which is probably going to be another year and a half.

CG:What productions have you been involved with as an actor during your three years here?

RC:My first one was A Torch Song Trilogy, then Ten Little Indians, Romeo and Juliet, Tales of the Lost Formicans and Cat on A Hot Tin Roof.

CG:So you've been keeping busy.

RC:Yeah, but it's been a lot of fun.

CG:What groups have you been involved with?

RC:I've been involved with three of the four groups - those being the SVP (Student Valley Productions), The UMass Theatre Guild and the University's Theater Dept. I just became a theater major two semesters ago so I'm trying to stick with Theater department productions.

CG:What was your first play here and how did you get involved?

RC:It was Torch Song. Actually, I'd been here a year and was totally afraid of theater, although I loved to act, so a friend took the liberty of signing me up for the audition and we both happened to get picked for the show.

CG:With the different roles you've played, who's been your favorite and why?

RC:(SMILING) Oh, definitely it would be a character called "ALIEN" which I played in Formicans last semester. The character consisted of six different characters so I got to play everything from a cheesy alien television announcer to a swearing truck driver. It was really diverse. It was good.

CG:In which play do you feel your most personal work was done and what character was most reflective of who Rob Corddry is?

RC:Well, I'd definitely have to say BRICK in Cat - not because he's an alcoholic ex-football player, which I am not...

It was just the emotion. It was my first big emotional role. It made me more in touch with the character unlike other roles where I'd played the stupid, pretty-boy, wise-ass. It (the role) gave me the chance to actually draw some emotion from myself and use it on stage.

CG:So are we to assume then that it was also your most challenging role?

RC:Yes. Definitely yes.

CG:When did your interest in acting begin and what influences have most affected you?

RC:Actually, my biggest influence was The Boy Scouts of America. I was always big at the campfire: "Here's the campfire - Where's Rob?" So that really started me out.

In terms of actors, I consider myself more a comedic actor than a dramatic actor so I'd have to say, Kevin Kline, Chevy Chase — guys along those lines.

CG:For someone so involved with the theater program, why major in English?

RC:Well, writing has always been my major passion since I was a kid. I started out as an english major only

IRONICALLY, THE TIME TO START SAVING FOR RETIREMENT IS WHEN IT LOOKS LIKE YOU CAN LEAST AFFORD IT.

Can't afford to save for retirement? The truth is, you can't afford not to. Not when you realize that your retirement can last 20 to 30 years or more. You'll want to live at least as comfortably then as you do now. And that takes planning.

By starting to save now, you can take advantage of tax-deferral and give your money time to compound and grow. Consider this: set aside just $100 each month beginning at age 30 and you can accumulate over $192,539* by the time you reach age 65. But wait ten years and you'll have to budget $227 each month to reach the same goal.

Even if you're not counting the years to retirement, you can count on TIAA-CREF to help you build the future you deserve—with flexible retirement and tax-deferred annuity plans, a diverse portfolio of investment choices, and a record of personal service that spans 75 years.

Over a million people in education and research put TIAA-CREF at the top of their list for retirement planning. Why not join them?

Call today and learn how simple it is to build a secure tomorrow when you have time and TIAA-CREF working on your side.

Mr. Lupo's movie shorts

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

The end of the summer movie releases are usually a mixed bag of total bombs, okay diversions and one or two that easily stay ahead of the pack. The verdicts are in:

Unforgiven (B+), a great morality play/western that boasts an inventive and intricate plot, a complex moral subtext and some of the best exchanges between actors that I've seen in a while. Unforgiven tells the story of an ex-hired killer played by Clint Eastwood (director, too) who comes out of retirement (for the right price, of course) to avenge an attack on a prostitute.

He brings along his old partner played by Morgan Freeman (isn't it about time he plays a hero instead of a sidekick to a white one?) and a young upstart called the Schofield Kid (Jaimez Woolvett). Gene Hackman plays the sheriff in the town where the attack happened. The line between law and justice as well as good and evil are blurred in Unforgiven, making the moral motivations quite interesting.

This may be sacriligious to say, but I thought Clint Eastwood's performance was one of his weakest. He's played this role before and the comic elements of his performance (i.e. he has trouble getting on his horse over and over again) don't mesh with the serious aim the film takes. Fortunately, his directing is much better.

Gene Hackman turns in an amazingly layered performance and Richard Harris adds great support to this slow-building, yet rich film.

Enchanted April (B-) is a nice but ever so thin piece of art house feel-good fluff that tells the story of four different women who share a vacation house in the Italian countryside in order to escape their individual problems. Think of it as E.M. Forster-lite. It's almost unbelievably hollow as each of the women solve their maladies so quickly it was as if they were trying to beat the clock to the end of the film. Two of the women's husbands are insentive lugs at the beginning but turn into romantic love studs the minute they see their wives again with little or no transformations shown.

Enchanted April is filmed in garish close-up that is very annoying. Despite being very well-acted, the film is way too convenient to be taken seriously. Skip it and see Howards End (A), a much better movie.

David Lynch has hit a career nadir with his prequel to his cult fave-turned-bore television series Twin Peaks: Fire Walk With Me (D-), a completely useless piece of avant-garde nonsense. Lynch's films, from Eraserhead to the Twin Peaks pilot were intense and original journeys that were actually about something. Here, all of the weirdness just seems like rejects from Lynch's bag of tricks. It's not as bad as everyone has been saying, it's even worse.

Tom Selleck as the King of Spain. That just sums up how incredibly moronic and astoundingly lame Christopher Columbus: The Discovery (D-) is. This film suffers from a severe identity crisis, making Columbus (played by unknown George Correface) a hero, then a crazy baffoon, then a hero again. A bloated and tedious Marlon Brando plods his way to the bank in a cameo that's disguised as a supporting performance. Wait for Ridley Scott's 1492 this fall...I'd bet my mother it will be miles better than this schlock.

because, to tell you the truth, it's the safest choice. If I suffer from a massive lobotomy which prohibits me from acting then I'll always have my BA in English. Then I can WRITE stupid things instead of ACTING stupid things. I like them both.

CG:What would you be doing with your life if you weren't acting?

RC:I'd be writing. My major goal is to become the new Sam Shepard, write plays and also get good acting roles.

CG:Where do you see yourself in 5 years?

RC:Happy - because I'm very rarely sad.

CG:O.k., where do you see yourself artistically in 5 years?

RC:Whether I'm working as BINGO the clown at the Ground Round or as the new Kevin Costner I will be happy regardless of what I'm doing. (BEAT) I can fool myself into being happy. (LAUGHTER)

CG:What makes Rob Corddry a standout?

RC:I'm funny, good sense of humor, I have a likeable stage prescence, I consider myself fairly charasmatic and...I'm a great kisser.

CG:What's your favorite film?

RC:Favorite film? HEATHER'S.

CG:Why HEATHER'S?

RC:'Cause of Winona, man! (LAUGHTER)

CG:Who's your favorite muppet and why?

RC:My favorite muppet is definitely GONZO because of that chicken thing he's got going for him.

CG:Favorite music?

RC:All but polka- and I know this is blasphemey- but I really don't like Jazz.

CG:I think we've found our headline, "Rob Corddry — An Artist Who Hates Jazz".

RC:(LAUGHING) It's tinkle music.

CG:If you had to choose between either fame on the screen or on the stage where would you go?

RC:Every actor says that they don't want fame. That all they want is a comfortable life on the stage, which I'd be very happy with. Yet again — every American has that hidden, innate desire for recognition and fame. But I don't think I'd be happy with that. It's very drawing. Fame sucks. I'd rather do stage.

CG:What's the sincerest form of flattery you've received for your acting?

RC:The most flattering thing is honesty. When people have the courage to ask,"Why'd you make this choice here?" and "What made you do that?" False compliments don't help you grow.

CG:Why do you do what you do?

RC:"Cause it makes me feel good.

CG:Advice to the up and comers?

RC:Be honest with yourself, be impulsive. As Shakespeare said,"Be true to yourself so you can be true to others." Take chances. Be real. Don't play the game.

CG:Finally, Rob Corddry's philosophy on life?

RC:Nothing is real, Wear a condom and smoke 'em if you got 'em.

New England: Views from the Outside

By MARK K. ANDERSON
Collegian Correspondent

"No way." I incredulously laughed.

"I kid you not." He stated.

Invariably, some form of the above words is exchanged when a person learns of the True Source of Local Pride.

It's not the colleges. Not the communal atmosphere. Not the space waffle. (The world's only campus center to be modeled after a breakfast food, mind you.) No, no, no, no.

It's The Amherst Salamander Tunnel that really turns heads and attracts tourists around here.

Officially 5-years-old as of September, this internationally known (yes, you read that right) underground passageway allows our hot dog-sized friends safe exodus from forests east of Henry Street in North Amherst to their mating grounds on the other side.

The tunnel and its amphibious users have been featured on NBC, ABC, PBS, National Public Radio, The Associated Press, Radio Tokyo, Canadian Broadcasting Company, The New York Times and a host of children's publications. To top it off, The Environmental President sent Amherst's point-of-light a letter of commendation.

Yet, our outstanding testament to Salamander Family Values was not always such a triumphant success.

The tunnel's history intertwines the interests of area politicians, local environmentalists, a London-based conservation association and an East German doctor fleeing persecution for a crime he did not commit.

Well, okay, maybe I got a little carried away with that doctor bit.

In any case, those living on portions of Henry Street have long known of ambystoma maculatum's tendency to come out of hibernation on the first warm rain of spring and, like many collegiate homo sapiens on spring break, head for the beach. Neither remember to bring sun block. Unlike those practicing Fort Lauderdale mating rituals, however, the salamanders have no previous experience in dealing with traffic on the way to their mating grounds.

Unfortunately, this means that many salamanders on their way to making nooky make lizardburger when they meet Mr. B.F. Goodrich head-on.

Now, strictly speaking, neither of the above populations has the cranial capacity to outwit a paperweight. (Especially considering that the collegiate crowds in question have been ingesting substances known to induce downward motion on the food chain.) Therefore, the typical salamander or for that matter, the typical drunk Daytona Beach lunkhead, must be physically forced to do anything. Anything. Including those things that would prevent it from being killed.

So it was some fifteen-odd years ago that area residents took to the annual ritual of lifting salamanders over Henry Street in early April. One year, after a feature on NBC's "The Today Show," a man responsible for building England's famous toad tunnels (this is absolutely true) telephoned Robert Winston, the person who had started the whole Amherst salamander movement.

"He basically offered to broker a deal with ACO Polymer Products, Inc. in Ohio who would donate a tunnel for the salamanders," Mr. Winston recalled.

After Amherst donated an afternoon's worth of labor, the tunnel was ready for 1988's spring migration season.

And wow did it flop. One lone critter utilized the tunnel during its inaugural season. The New York Times and The Boston Globe ran stories about the thwarted attempt.

However, once Robert Winston and Audubon Society naturalists realized the drunk-Daytona-Beach-lunkheadedness of their salamanders, the solution was obvious. Physical-coersion. Funnel the buggers into the tunnel with a hundred or so feet of fence.

Since the fence installation, things have been working so well that the media attention has now started to dwindle. After all, no one cares about a piece of engineering that quietly does its job.

Except for the salamanders, I suppose.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You are coming down the home stretch where your career is concerned. Soon you will reap the fruits of your labor. Improved health gives you energy. Romance begins to sizzle.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Your super organizational skills put you in good stead with influential people. Do not be afraid to tout your talents. People love you for your sage advice and understanding manner.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Be thorough in everything that you do. An older person's interest in you is a blessing. If thinking about early retirement, consult you mate before making definite plans.

CANCER (Jun 21-July 22): Do not procrastinate or someone could beat you to the punch. Listen to higher-ups — you can learn from them. Dining with a friend could be more fun than a blind date.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Look within yourself to find the answers you seek. Greater self-discipline will help you accomplish major goals. Organize, streamline and channel your energies productively.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Curb your temper and be patient. Although morning is a good time for chores, the afternoon demands a change of pace. Yesterdays fortunate trends continue.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Recent developments in a relationship give you greater confidence. However, the attitude of certain co-workers could be puzzling.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): As the weekend approaches, you have plenty to be cheerful about. Forget any lingering doubts. You will probably be able to finish work early. Do some household shopping.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A financial mix-up is possible today. Be extra careful when paying bills or making a bank deposit. You may have to change some social plans later today.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Give your imagination free rein and you will land a new contract. VIPs are impressed by your confidence in a clever idea. Allow loved ones to enjoy life in their own way.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Wind up routine matters as quickly as possible, but postpone beginning any new projects until Monday. Certain phone calls must be made before the weekend. Get an early start if taking a trip.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Be diplomatic in all your contacts. Throwing your weight around could antagonize people in positions to help you. Creative endeavors flourish.

UMass cyclist in Chicago for nat'l championships

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Dan Goldsmith isn't exactly what you'd call a typical UMass student. He's one of the best in the country at his sport.

The senior cyclist from Chicago, IL is heading home this weekend to take on the best cyclists in the country at the National Collegiate Track Cycling Championships. The Nationals are comprised of two sections, track racing and road racing, and Golsmith is looking to medal in the track competition. He will compete today, Saturday and possibly Sunday.

Goldsmith has been looking forward to this event all year, and while his family moved to Colorado to be closer to the Olympic Training Center in Colorado Springs, he has been prepping in Chicago for the last two weeks.

Goldsmith said that while last year, the UMass cycling team competed in the Nationals and fared well, he is the team's sole representative this year.

The Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration major was asked why he chose to stay in school, instead of trying to cycle professionally.

"School has always been the most important thing for me," he responded. "Without a degree, I can't guarantee myself the type of lifestyle I'd like to lead."

Goldsmith is competing in two events, the 1 km time trial, or "kilo", and the 200M match sprints. The events will take place on different days, giving Goldsmith a chance to focus on both.

"The two events are separate," he said. "I could fall flat on my face in the kilo [today] and come back and win the match sprints."

The track in Chicago is made of asphalt with a white gypsum coating. The embankment is 20 degrees, and while Goldsmith has practiced on it, he prefers Barcelona's Olympic Velodrome.

"The Olympic track is much faster and slicker," he said. "This track is slower and has shallower turns. It might be a disadvantage for me, but at least I have knowledge of the track."

The 1 km time trial is difficult because it requires cyclists to go from a standing position to an extremely high speed, all in a short time. The 200M match sprints are similar, only there is less time to reach speeds as high as 43 mph.

Goldsmith said his times are among the top seven or 10 in the country, and he feels his chances for succeeding this weekend in both events are high.

"My goal is to ascend to the elite level of track cycling," he said. "This is my last chance to do it for myself and for the cycling team."

Water polo takes on Iona in opener

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

Old opponents, like old habits, die hard.

The last game of last season for the University of Massachusetts water polo team was an 11-10 overtime victory over Iona. As the Minutemen travel to West Point, N.Y. this weekend for the Army Invitational tournament, they will play Iona in the first game.

Also on the line in this rivalry are bragging rights for the Army tournament, as Iona beat UMass 10-6 last year in the championship game.

"It's a good rivalry," said UMass head coach Russ Yarworth. "We're going there with the hopes of winning it. But, I'm going to play about 12, 13, or 14 players. Whatever I have to do to get a good long look at my players so I can evaluate them and see who will progress to give us the strongest starting line-up and bench by the middle of the season.

"I'm pretty excited about this year," he said. "The kids seem to have a better attitude than in previous years. I see a team developing, whereas last year we had a lot of individuals trying to accomplish a goal, which might be the little difference to put us over the edge."

One of the things Yarworth will be taking a good look at is the play of Pepperdine transfer Jeremy Alters, a player that Yarworth feels is so experienced and talented that he can play several positions. Alters is suffering from strained ligaments in the thumb of his non-shooting hand, but should be ready to go this weekend.

Some things on this team are a given: big Tsan Engin battling in front of the goal as 'hole-man'; the speed and aggressiveness of drivers Scott Reed, Jay Peluso and Dan McOsker; the finesse of driver Javier Gonzalez; the passes of hole-man Adolfo Oliete; and the booming left-handed shots of Luke Harlan.

One of the problems the team faced last year was not getting up for big games, a problem they will have to shed if they are to advance past the disappointing first round exits in the Eastern Championships the past three years.

There has been a flu virus making the rounds of the team this week, but with the rigorous practice schedule over now that classes have started, the strength of the under-the-weather players should improve daily.

GAME NOTES - Of the seven multi-team tournaments the team will play this year, this weekend's event is the only one-day tournament. The champion will have to win four games Sunday to claim the crown. With UMass and Iona playing at 8 a.m., the prospects for a long day are pretty good.

Stapleton's pre-season pigskin picks

Well, it's that time of the year when the rotisserie baseball stats get thrown in the desk and football fanatics once again take center stage. So, without hesitation, I'll put on my prognosticating hat and bring you my 1992-93 Professional Football Preview.

Let's start off in the worst division in football, the AFC Central. Competition in these standings will be hard to find, as the Houston Oilers will run away with the title, probably along with the home field advantage when the playoffs start. A key is that the Oilers play the NFC Central when they leave the division, so the competition should get no tougher.

Arthur
STAPLETON

When trying to find exciting players in this division, after Warren Moon and his trio of receivers (Ernest Givens, Curtis Duncan, and Haywood Jeffires), I went no further than Cincinnati's Harold Green, who will make a giant step towards being one of the top three running backs in the league. He'll fall short, but his efforts should earn him a spot in the Pro Bowl.

In the AFC West, the Kansas City Chiefs will make a move towards the top, with Derrick Thomas anchoring the best defense in the AFC. However, the Chiefs will fall short when it comes to winning the division: Denver is my pick, with K.C. getting a wild card berth.

The Broncos(yes, the same team who choked in the championship last year) were one half away from again returning to the Super Bowl. A good young defense and a healthy John Elway should provide the team from Mile High to gallop again to the division title.

Now to the AFC East, where the competition is growing for the defending division champs, the Buffalo Bills. The Miami Dolphins helped themselves immensely with the addition of first round draft picks Marco Coleman and Troy Vincent. They will nab a wild card, along with the Jets, who will take a step back for the future with Browning Nagle as their starter.

The New England Patriots are in for an optimistic year, as they will surpass the six win plateau. However, a seven win season will only get them fourth place in this division.

Hugh Millen should mature into a good quarterback who could play in the big game (those of you who saw last season's gallant run against Denver know what I mean), but for now, he's a mediocre leader on an average team.

In the NFC Central, I like the Chicago Bears to overtake the incumbent Lions as divisional champs, leaving Wayne Fontes and company with a wild card. The Lions will always be dangerous with Barry Sanders, but with a player like Tom Waddle, Da Bears will be to tough to beat.

Atlanta is an interesting team in the NFC West, and I think with Chris Miller leading the charge, the new "men in black" will christen the Georgia Dome with a divisional title. Everybody's favorite San Francisco, without Joe Montana, will fall short once again of the playoffs.

Now, to the best division in football: the NFC East, where the impending Super Bowl Champions hail from. Washington will soon realize that youth in January finally overcomes age in September. It is imminent that the Philadelphia Eagles will suffer from the loss of the late Jerome Brown. Randall Cunningham is back, and they signed Herchel Walker but it won't get them any more than a third place finish.

Yes, I'll let the cat out of the bag, to use a cliche, and tell you that my team is the Dallas Cowboys. Emmitt Smith is finally getting the respect he deserves, and he will lead the Villone returns to UM, negotiations 'up in air'

Ron Villone, the Seattle Mariners' first round draft pick, has come back to UMass — for now. The senior from Bergenfield, NJ is still negotiating with the major league club, and is practicing with the UMass baseball team, and intends to pitch for UMass this season if he can't settle his contract. Villone was 7- with a 3.34 ERA last season, and won a second consecutive A-10 Pitcher of the Year award. He also pitched for the United States Olympic Team, notching a 1-1 record in Barcelona.

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

UMass left-handed pitcher Ron Villone has come full circle, returning to the life he had before his home town celebrated him with a post-Olympic parade, before the major league draft, and before pitching professionally was an impending certainty.

Ron Villone is, for now, a UMass student. The senior from Bergenfield, NJ has decided to return to school for now and work on his Sport Management degree while he continues contract negotiations with the Seattle Mariners, the team that selected him 14th in the first round of this year's June draft.

A year ago today, Villone's life was a lot simpler. Villone was strapping on his football helmet, ready to embark on another All-Yankee Conference season. This season, he's strapping on his helmet for another tough sport: major league negotiating.

Villone, last year's A-10 Pitcher of the Year and U.S. Olympic Team member, said he has mixed feelings about coming back to UMass, but vows to stay as long as he has to, even the whole year.

"There's a lot of mixed feelings," he said. "I'd like to be playing football, I'd like to be with the Mariners, and I'm happy to be with the baseball team."

Villone enrolled Wednesday after it became apparent that his contract would not be settled. Seattle still retains his rights until December 31st of this year, after which, if he is not signed, he can be redrafted in June 1993 by any major league club.

"I'm not going to go with an organization that's not going to treat me fairly," said Villone. "All that I want is what I think I'm entitled to. Who knows, I might be signed tonight or tomorrow. It's up in the air."

Villone returned to the baseball team Wednesday and has been pitching on the side and doing conditioning exercises. Coach Mike Stone said he's happy to have the lefty back, and said another year could possibly improve his position in the draft.

Oh, yeah, Villone realized even with his new found fame, some things never change.

"The Registrar's Office screwed up my schedule," he lamented. "They thought I graduated and they didn't give me my classes. I've have 5 classes, but only 2 that I need, and now I'm gonna have to beg my professors to get into their classes."

'Boys to a divisional title, with the defending champions and the Eagles grabbing wild cards.

I like Buffalo coming out of the AFC, defeating Kansas City on their way to their third Super Bowl in three years. Even though Buffalo will return to the show, expect signs of the changing of the guard, as the Jets, Houston, and Denver edge closer to knocking off the Bills.

The Dallas Cowboys will make it through the treacherous NFC, defeating Washington in the championship before meeting the Bills in the Super Bowl. It will be an offensive war, with Troy Aikman and Jim Kelly shooting it out and pouring on the points. In the end, I think that Dallas will complete the rebuilding quest and allow me, along with many other football fans, to be proud of the best Super Bowl in years. Dallas 31 Buffalo 27

The Franklin County Soccer Association will sponsor recreational pick-up games, structured around the number of players on any given day. One week may accommodate 40 players by running two, full field games, and the next week run a round robin six-on-six to accommodate 15 to 20 players.

This program will run every Sunday from 4-6 p.m. The program will start September 13 and run through November 8, 1992. All games will be played behind the Greenfield High School, with parking available at Friendly's on Federal Street.

The FCSA, in pursuit of promoting soccer, will provide sponsorship, organization, and instruction. They ask that all players bring $1.00, along with a dark and white shirt. The FCSA will make available the fields, nets and officials, but the emphasis will be on everyone having fun. Bring your own water and please stretch out properly. Minutemen travel to Delaware in season opener

Wide receiver Eric Thimas and the UMass football team face an old nemesis Saturday at 1 p.m., the Delaware Fighting Blue Hens.

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

Every sports team has a nemesis - the University of Massachusetts football squad is no exception. After ending its 15 game losing streak to the University of Delaware Blue Hens in 1990, UMass was unable to make it two in a row last year, as they lost to Delaware 24-7 in the season home opener at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

This year, the Minutemen will again open their season against the Hens, this time in the confines of Delaware Stadium Saturday at 1:00 p.m. First year head coach Mike Hodges will have his hands full with a Delaware team that boasts 15 returning starters back from last year's successful 10-2 campaign.

The Minutemen are led by co-captains Bill Durkin, who has been playing both guard and tackle, and defensive tackle John Creamer, who started all 11 games last year. The preseason saw a battle for starting quarterback take place between fifth-year senior Tom Fasano and redshirt freshman Andrew McNeilly but it will be McNeilly who will start this Saturday. McNeely earned the job by showing the ability to run the UMass option attack, the same offense his Melrose High School team ran.

1990 Yankee Conference Rookie-of-the Year John Johnson will take over for the graduated Jerome Bledsoe at tailback and junior Mike George will return to his starting spot at fullback and will also take over the punting duties. Eric Thimas will return at wide receiver and he will be joined by Steve Dembrowski and Matt Reid. At tight end, Steve Dembowski, Matt Stefanski and Cesar Tejeda will comprise one of the most potent pass-catching and blocking attacks in the league.

Outside linebacker Mario Perry, who missed the final 10 games of the '91 season with an ankle injury and cornerback Don Caparotti, a legitimate All-America candidate who doubles as a punt and kick returner, will spearhead the UMass defense. They'll be joined by free safety Matt Rajotte and Scott Assencoa, a two-year starter at outside linebacker.

For Delaware, which won their 14th Lambert cup trophy as the top team in Division 1-AA, Quarterback Bill Vergantino is an All-Yankee Conference selection but is a question mark for tomorrow's game with a knee injury. Vergantino, who led the Blue Hens in rushing (151-673, 7 TDs) as well as passing (1393 yds, 11 TDs), will be joined by leading receiver Keita Malloy (33-604 18.3 4 TDS) and an offensive line led by 6'5", 265 Lb. tackle Rick Anderson.

Defensively, 6'5" 260 lb. tackle Mark Hrubar had eight QB sacks last year and All-Yankee Conference defensive back Warren McIntyre picked off an NCAA-leading nine interceptions and knocked away 11 others. Four-year starter Tim Jacobs (All-YanCon last year) and Junior Scott Acker return on the corners; Sophomore starter Pat Mulhern (60 tackles last year), one of the most highly regarded linebackers in the league, will also return this season. A blow for the Delaware squad is that defensive tackle Scott Griemsmann, a second team All-YC pick in 1991, is out for the year with a knee injury. Overall, Head Coach Tubby Raymond's Blue Hen squad looks to be one of the more formidable opponents that the Minutemen will face this year.

Minutemen Notes: The game can be heard beginning at 1:00 p.m. on WMUA (91.1 FM) with Brian Jones and Dave Ohldread and on WTTT Amherst (1430 AM) with Mike Fagerson doing the play-by-play and Jim Degnim as the color man.

Soccer programs gear up for the huge weekend

• Women take on two in UMass Classic

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Amherst will be the sight of some tremendous collegiate women's soccer action this weekend as the University of Massachusetts hosts the UMass Classic.

The ninth-ranked Minutewomen (1-0), will face No. 12 William and Mary (2-0) at 1 p.m. on Saturday and St. Mary's (CA) (1-0) at 11 a.m. on Sunday. No. 16 New Hampshire will also face both teams at the Classic.

Massachusetts' toughest game of the weekend will come from William and Mary. The Tribe have already defeated Campbell College 4-1 and Maryland 2-0.

"[William and Mary] will be a big test to find out who we are," Massachusetts coach Jim Rudy said. "When I look at William and Mary I think they are underranked. They are 15 or 16 deep and have one of the better rosters in the country."

Tribe coach John Daly returns his leading scorer in Rebecca Wakefield (10 goals) and has received immediate help from bluechip recruit Natale Neaton. Neaton, who came close to signing with Massachusetts, has already pumped in four goals this year.

"Neaton is dangerous," Rudy said. "She is one of the top freshman forwards in the country. I thought we had her but she went to William and Mary right at the end."

Daly said, "It should be a great game. UMass is a very good team. It will be a tough game between two tough teams."

Sunday's contest against St. Mary's should not be much easier. The Gaels cracked the Top 20 for the first time last season and should be as strong this season.

St. Mary's returns sophomore forward Lori Hockerson (10-3-23 last season), who lead the team in scoring in 1991. Hockerson scored two in the Gaels 3-0 opening game win against California-Davis.

"St. Mary's is always a difficult opponent for us because of their style of defense," Rudy said. "They are a fairly young team. They start five freshman but the recruits are the best they have ever brought in."

The Minutewomen, who defeated a pesky Boston College team 3-2 last Saturday, may be without starting forward Colleen Milliken due to a sprained ankle. Also midfielder Amy Cockley has left the team for personal reasons.

Filling in the gaps could fall to some of the freshman. Against Boston College, both Courtney Smith and Nicole Roberts gave strong efforts in starting roles. Off the bench Rachel LeDuc assisted on Amy Trunk's game winner after battling relentlessly for a loose ball.

"We are short right now," Rudy said. "Now is the time for people who do not like the bench, to get off the bench and make a contribution."

• Men's soccer to host Temple Owls

JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

Last year when the University of Massachusetts played Temple University, the two rivals played to a 0-0 tie after two overtimes. That game took place at Temple and could definitely have been described as a defensive struggle.

This year the two teams will be battling it out at Garber Field here in Amherst. The Saturday game is scheduled for 11:00 a.m.

For the Minutemen this will be their third contest of the year. They opened up with a 2-1 victory over St. Bonaventure and followed that up with a big win over the University of New Hampshire on Wednesday.

The 4-1 triumph against UNH was particularly impressive because of the strong two-way play of the team. The Minutemen were able to adapt and play a physical game against the tough Wildcats.

New goalie, sophomore Mark Wolf, continued his stellar play in net as he stopped six New Hampshire bids on the way to victory. The fact that Wolf faced only seven total shots was a credit to the UMass defense and their ability to take control of the ball at midfield.

Last year's leading scorer, junior Todd Kylish, has continued where he left off last season. After scoring a goal against the Bonnies in the opener, Kylish added another against UNH.

Another sniper for the Minutemen thus far has been junior Randy Jacobs. After not playing the first half against UNH, Jacobs drilled two second half goals to seal the Minuteman win.

The most impressive playmaker for UMass in this still young season has been junior midfielder Justin Edelman. Edelman has been titled by coach Sam Koch as a "player who makes the offense go".

The Temple Owls come to town on a down note after dropping their opener to Navy, 3-1, on the road. Navy was able to beat Owl goalie Pat Kivlin, a senior, for three goals.

On offense the Owls are led by pesky junior Andrew Craig, a midfielder. Craig had five shots on goal against the Midshipmen and one of those shots found net.

The second leading scorer from last years' Owl team, junior midfielder Jason Hunter, assisted on Craigs' goal. Last year Hunter had six goals, four of them game winners.

The Owls may not be a team threatening the top of the Atlantic-10, but the rivalry between Temple and UMass is huge. Saturday's game may resemble last year's deadlock.

Schedule note: The home game against Holy Cross scheduled for September 16th has been rescheduled to September 15th at 3:30.

Minutewomen beat BC 2-1, face UNH

LILLIAN K. LEGGIO
Collegian Staff

After a controversial first-half goal off a penalty corner, the University of Massachusetts women's field hockey team was unnerved during Wednesday night's game against Boston College. Fortunately for the the Minutewomen (1-0), they were able to regroup and squeak by the Eagles 2-1.

The contested goal came at the 29 minute mark as the referees called for penalty corner after an infraction by UMass. BC's Jennifer Baker and Allison Corradi set up Jen Mundano for a goal that according to UMass coach Pam Hixon was above the allowable 18-inch board that marks a legal goal off a penalty corner.

"The shot was thigh high on Ainslee Press (the defender in front of the net)," said Hixon. "It deflated us to see the goal count and got us out of synch."

A rejuvenated BC team (1-1) capitalized on this by shifting gears to a more aggressive and physical game that seemed to further stun UMass.

"Once we saw the tide turning, we settled down and played our game," said BC coach Sherren Granese. "We knew we needed to play physically to take UMass out of the groove they'd been in."

UMass had begun the game in a groove of crisp passes and constant offensive pressure. It paid off after a Kathy Phelan shot on goal. The BC defense tried to clear the ball, but UMass' Press intercepted the ball in front of the net and slapped it past goalie Heather Welch and tied the game at 1.

In the second half, the Eagles came out attacking, but their bubble quickly burst as UMass regained its composure and poured on pressure that led to a goal off a penalty stroke by Press at 24:59 and gave UMass a 2-1 lead.

UMass will need to play with more intensity than they did Wednesday, when they face the University of New Hampshire (11-6-2 last season) Saturday afternoon at Totman Field.

This year, however could be a different story as UNH lost five starters to graduation including their goalie and second leading scorer. UNH will also be without the services of their leading scorer, Sunna Roulston, who underwent surgery.

In their absence, UNH will look to sophomore Kathy Cortez, who was third in team scoring and seniors Tracy Hayes and Patti Manning to pick up the slack in the offense. As far as their goaltending question, UNH will rest their hopes on junior Jenn Bouchie and freshman Shane Medico.

Women challenge varsity sports cuts

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

Almost two years after the Univeristy of Massachusetts women's varsity tennis and lacrosse teams were eliminated, members of both teams are fighting, with the help of a lawyer, the University's spring 1991 decision.

Former members of both teams are currently negotiating with the University to be reinstated, according to the lawyer representing the tennis and lacrosse teams, Patty Flannery, who specializes in sex discrimination cases.

Because of the ongoing negotiations, former members of the teams and Flannery are unable to comment on specific aspects of the case.

Three women's varsity teams have been eliminated (tennis, lacrosse and volleyball) since 1989 compared to one men's team (tennis).

This leaves 13 male teams (not including hockey, which is scheduled to become a part of the University in upcoming years) and 10 teams for women to participate in.

The Office for Civil Rights in the U.S. Department of Education is considering issuing a letter warning the University of such cuts, according to Kathryn Reith, the communications and advocacy director for the Women's Sports Foundation, based in New York.

In support of the team's fight for reinstatement, Reith feels the University of Massachusetts is in violation of a federal civil rights law mandating equal opportunity for men and women to participate in sports.

Reith said the women's tennis team has a "very good case for reinstatement and should receive damages."

Recent cuts to women's varsity athletic teams widened the gap between the men's and women's athletic programs, argues Reith, violating Title IX — a statute which calls for equal participation and funding of sports between men and women.

"There is clearly a violation [of Title IX]" said Reith.

Reith said women have fewer opportunities to play on varsity teams and that a "major violation" exists with UMass accepting outside funds to support the men's soccer team.

"The source of funds is irrelevant," said Reith, referring to the money donated by the World Cup Soccer Camp for the men's soccer team.

"As a result of cuts, the percentage of athletes who are female have decreased from about 41 percent to 30 percent. Essentially, that's where the violation of Title IX comes in," said Reith.

The statute is basically intended to maintain balance — a 50-50 split between male and female sports, not necessarily by team, but between the number of men and women who participate in collegiate athletics.

Reith said UMass is violating the law by not creating equal opportunities between men and women.

"By cutting three women's and one men's team, the opportunities for a woman to participate in athletics have not been increasing to approach representation of the student body — they have been decreasing rapidly," said Reith.

The ultimate goal would be for example, if a student body has 60 percent males and 40 percent females, the percent of male athletes should be 60 percent and females should make up 40 percent.

But it doesn't always quite work out that way. It sounds simple and clear-cut, but how does a school equate the football team with some 70 players alone?

17th floor Washington flooded

Vandal fools with sprinkler head in bathroom

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

The newly renovated Washington Tower experienced a torrential downpour on the 17th floor last night when a sprinkler head was vandalized in the bathroom.

David Beaudin, an assistant fire prevention officer, said the sprinkler spouted between 70 and 150 gallons of water before a fire inspector could shut it off. "This is the first sprinkler that has ever been intentionally damaged," he said.

Students living on the all male floor said they suffered damage to various items including stereos, speakers, rugs and futons.

Ian Quinn, a sophomore fire science major, said he estimated the damage to his room to be between $1,500 to $2,000. "I want to know who is going to pay for this," he said.

Resident Assistant Sophomore Kate Coupland said the University is not responsible for the damages done to the students' property because the sprinkler was vandalized by a student.

"The student who gets caught will face criminal charges, will be libel to the University for the cost of the clean up and the cost of damages to the students' belongings," said Beaudin.

As of 6 p.m. on Sunday there was no suspect in the case but a few students said they would be on the lookout for any leads. Rich Spinale, a sophomore with an undeclared major, said, "I would gladly tell on the person because I would be $500 richer."

Tenant eviction cases on rise

By TONY ROGERS
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Hard times have driven a record number of people to the city's housing court, where hundreds of tenants line up each Thursday to battle landlords in eviction cases.

Some 4,937 eviction cases were brought to housing court in fiscal 1992, a 26 percent rise over the 3,928 cases brought last year and the most the court has seen in the 20 years it has kept records.

"This is extraordinary," said Harvey Chopp, executive Secretary of the Housing Court Department. "We've had jumps before, but never like this. This is bad."

And Boston isn't unique. Nationwide as the economy puts the squeeze on tenants and landlords alike, rent disputes that might have once been settled over coffee are going to court.

"It sounds almost stupid because it's self-evident, but the poverty level has increased, and the number of affordable housing units has decreased," said Steven Banks, coordinating attorney for the Legal Aid Society's Homeless Family Rights Project in New York. "So the consequences for housing are dire."

Boston's busy housing court only hears eviction cases on Thursdays. A few years ago it might have handled 120 cases a day. Now, 200 people or more line up at 9 a.m. sharp to wait to be called into the sweaty courtroom.

Jernione McFadden came to face off with his landlord over the most common eviction issues - rent and repairs.

McFadden complained that his two-bedroom apartment in the city's Roxbury section was infested with cockroaches, and had a ramshackle door that allowed thieves to burgle the place. He also said the landlord is illegally charging him $40 a month for water.

Black college students hear SUNY apology

ONEONTA, NY - (AP) - The president of the University of New York at Oneonta said official letters of apology will be sent to all 125 of the school's black male students after their names were given to police investigating a local attack.

And the commander of the local state police troop apologized for insensitivity by law-enforcement officials who asked for the list.

Police requested the list for an investigation into an attempted rape, burglary and assault Sept. 4 in the Town of Oneonta. The only description of the suspect was that he was a black male with cuts on his hands and arms.

"In our zeal to solve this serious crime, we pursued investigative leads...which we now know to be insensitive to the feelings and perceptions of minority studens," at Oneonta State, said Major Robert Farrand, commander of state police Troop C, based in Sidney.

"We acknowledge that we should not have requested the University to provide us with a list of names setting out one particular group of students," Forrand added.

Oneonta State President Alan Donovan told about 300 students, faculty and others gathered Thursday night that Leif Hartmark, the school's vice president for administration, would be sending the letters of apology. Hartmark released the list to authorities.

Donovan also said the college would be reviewing its policies so the incident would not happen again.

Earlier Thursday, about 500 students held an on-campus demonstration to protest the list being

COLLEGIAN
The Largest College Daily in New England

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published each weekday during the calendar semester with a circulation of 19,000. The Collegian is financially independent from the University of Massachusetts and operates solely on revenues generated from advertising sales. The paper was founded in 1890 as Aggie Life became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and then the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. The Collegian has been published daily since 1967.

Experience.

Real-life working experience.

That's what really matters once you graduate.
Like the skills you learn working at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, the largest independently run college daily in New England.
In fact, many of our current staffers spent their summers working at The Holyoke Transcript, The Middlesex News, WHDH-56, The Boston Globe, WHL, The Berkshire Eagle and the Associated Press.
And our alumni? They hold jobs at almost every major paper in the nation.
At the Collegian, you learn the skills you'll really need...from brainstorming for news features to writing stories on tight deadlines.
It's cool, casual, and you can go at your own pace.

Three-year-old saved from fall

NEW HAVEN, Conn. (AP) — Javon Saucier was playing football when he made a 30-yard dash to complete the greatest reception of his life: catching a 3-year-old neighbor falling from a window.

"I knew I could catch him," 6-year-old Javon said. "People were calling me, 'Javon, the hero.'"

Brandon Ellison's mother had told him Thursday evening that he couldn't go out because no one could watch him. He tried to sneak out through his second-floor window, about 15-feet off the ground.

Javon was playing football in the parking lot below when he saw Brandon squirming to pull himself back on the ledge.

"Brandon, you get back in," Javon shouted as he ran over.

When he realized Brandon was stuck, Javon told the youngester to hold on while he went to get Brandon's mother. But Javon realized he didn't have time before the boy would fall and shouted. "Let go, I'll catch you."

Brandon let go, missing a lower window ledge by inches as he fell into Javon's arms. Neither boy was injured.

Betsy Park, a nurse practitioner at Community Health Care Plan where Brandon was seen, said the boy could have been gravely injured if Javon had not helped him. Park gave Javon a $10 reward.

Sandra Crenshaw, Brandon's mother, said, "I hugged him and I thanked him. It had to be quick thinking on his part."

Quayle offends Murphy Brown

RADNOR, PA. (AP) — Candice Bergen says she used to think Vice President Dan Quayle was kind of cute, but she found his disparaging remarks about her television persona "Murphy Brown" and single-motherhood "really offensive."

"In the beginning, I was amused by all this. I always thought the vice president was kind of cute, you know, in a defenseless way," Bergen said in an interview for the latest issue of TV Guide.

"But now that he's come back with this new persona that they've invented for him...The(Bush)administration has taken on such an arrogant, aggressive tone, and I find that really offensive."

Bergen said the Quayle controversy increased the pressure for those involved in the show's hour-long season premiere Sept. 21. It won't be titled "Murphy's Revenge," as reported elsewhere, TV Guide said, although Quayle will come up.

The producers denied rumors that the vice president was invited to appear.

given to police. Many called for Hartmark's resignation.

Donovan said he would decide in the next few days on whether to discipline Hartmark, who admitted that he made a mistake.

"It's a mistake in judgment, and given another chance, we wouldn't do it again," Hartmark said Wednesday.

Campus counselor Bo Whaley said several black students told him that they were considering leaving the school 70 miles west of Albany because of the list.

"They're telling me they're getting dragged off buses," Whaley said. "One said, 'They came to my job. They (the people at work) think I'm guilty.'"

Approximately 8 percent to 10 percent of Oneonta State's 6,200 students are minorities.

Troopers are investigating a Sept. 4 incident in which a man broke into a home, cutting a 77-year-old woman and himself with a knife in an attempt to burglarize the residence.

The woman could only describe the man as black, so police began to search for a black man with cuts on his hands or wrists, troopers said.

H. Karl Chandler, a senior state police investigator, denied that racism was involved in singling out black college students.

"If your car has an accident and there's red paint on it, are you going to look for a green car?" he said.

A high ranking

A report issued by the magazine "Black Issues in Higher Education" showed that the University of Massachusetts ranks high among the top 100 colleges and universities nationwide for minority graduates.

The University ranks 9th in the number of doctoral degrees awarded to African Americans in all disciplines and 5th in the number of doctoral degrees awarded to Hispanics in all disciplines.

WMUA goes Pacific

The UMass radio station, WMUA (91.1 FM), is seriously expanding its coverage by bringing the Pacifica News Service to listeners, weeknights between 5:30 and 6 p.m.

"Increasingly, network news programs present only a narrow range of views and opinions, coming mainly from government spokespeople and various other 'major' figures," according to a statement from the radio station.

Watch out, NPR.

Smith: The Movie.

Hollywood is coming to Northampton. And maybe even Nicole Kidman.

Castle Rock Productions, the same folks who brought us "Misery" and "When Harry Met Sally," will be shooting some "external" shots at the college and in the local area for a Hollywood film.

The film is going to be a "thriller" in which one of the characters works on a New England college.

It will star Alec Baldwin, Nicole Kidman and Bill Pullman. "I think people are excited about it," said Stacey Schmeidel, the director of media relations for the women's college. "One woman even volunteered her house (for the film)."

Nicole Kiddman, wife of Tom Cruise, is planning on checking out some hotspots in Noho. But sources say none of the other top names will be staying in the local area.

The film company is also signing up students and locals to work as paid extras in the film. The movie crew will also be filming several shots in the Amherst area and also in Boston.

A teacher is a terrible thing to waste

"Teaching is central to the University," said Chancellor Richard O'Brien in announcing an award program to recognize excellence in undergraduate teaching on the Amherst campus.

"Attracting and keeping the best undergraduate students is a top priority," said O'Brien.

Each award will consist of $1,000 and a commemorative plaque.

Professor William Shepherd, chairman of the department of economics, proposed the new awards at an education conference.

"We need to reward excellent teaching, especially at a time when we cannot give salary increases," says Shepherd. "The awards offer something of value to good teachers. They provide higher self-esteem and promote the feeling that this is a better campus."

Criteria for the teaching awards include: subject mastery and scholarship; teaching effectiveness and creativity; impact on students; and contributions to the University's teaching mission.

Recycling station to be built

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

One of the largest college recycling transfer stations in the nation is being built on the northeast edge of the University of Massachusetts campus, according to R. M arc Fournier, the Physical Plant's solid waste manager.

"We are hoping it will be a national model," Fournier said.

The plant is being constructed by Fontaine Brothers, Inc. at the old Lawrence Riding Arena on Tilson Farm.

When it is finished at the end of October, the station will be 80 feet by 255 feet and one story high. Inside there will be seven areas to receive the recycling containers that are collected from the dorms and three outside.

The University is now recycling 25 percent of its solid waste. But two years ago when there was no recycling program, it cost the University $375,000 a year to sent its trash to landfills.

In addition to the station containing an office complex, it will include a computerized truck scale.

Once the waste in the recycling containers is delivered to the station, the waste will be sorted into non-recyclable and recyclable categories.

Non-recyclable material includes contaminated waste such as paper towels. The station will store the recyclable material, until it is sold to a company to be recycled.

Because less waste ends up in the landfill, the school will be spending less in dumping fees and earning money from the resale of waste, according to Fournier. He predicted the $800,000 station will pay for itself in about five years.

"It gives us a way to cut down on transit cost and it gives us storage space," Fournier said. "Everything going to the facility will get reused and recycled."

The Physical Plant plans to reinvest the money saved by the project by expanding the recycling program.

"The students are more into recycling," Fournier said. "And, the program wants students to recycle more."

Campus Fest offers prizes

By MICHELLE BAYLISS

Free food!

Now that we have your attention, Campus Fest is returning to the University of Massachusetts today and tomorrow with all the fun, games and free samples which students, faculty and staff have come to expect — as well as a campaign by one participant to raise political awareness.

In addition, Home Box Office (HBO) will be celebrating its 20 year of cable TV programs with a voter information and registration drive.

Over a dozen national companies will be featured at Campus Fest, a two-day "mega-event" sponsored by The Campus Center for the entire academic community.

The festival, returning for the fourth year in a row, includes free food, games, prizes ad sweepstakes as well as giveaways, samples demonstrations and displays by local, regional and national companies. There will be five tents set up and organizers said about 1,000 students attended the Fest last year.

"It should be a lot of fun. There's something for everybody," said the Campus Center Director, William Harris. "There's a lot to gain here and students really appreciate it."

Campus Fest will be held on Monday and Tuesday from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. on the South Student Union Lawn.

At Campus Fest, Hyundai has a national sweepstakes with two Scoupe Turbo cars as grand prizes. T-shirts and sunglasses will be awarded all day. Kellogg's will give away free Pop-Tarts toaster pastries.

Hershey will give away candy bars and sponsor a football game. Microsoft will demonstrate Windows 3.1 and other computer software. At MCI students can receive information on long distance services and sign up for a free MCI card.

HBO's participation also includes a national sweepstakes for students to win trips to HBO concert, boxing and other events; prizes include hotel and airfare for two and $300 spending money.

Campus Fest is produced by MarketSource Corporation of Cranbury, New Jersey.

Dan Stewart, a first year pre-medicine major, said he would not report who was responsible for the damage because the incident is over and nothing could be done about it. "I'll look back on this as a comical and classic freshman story," he said.

Students said they were upset and frustrated because of the damage and because they were not allowed into their rooms until 3 a.m. Roomates Spinale and Aaron Lewis, a sophomore with an undeclared major, said they were written up by a resident assistant because they didn't evacuate the building quickly enough.

"We were trying to save our things from the water and we get fined $50. It's the icing on the cake," said Lewis.

Students said they were pleased with the quick response of the police, fire departments and the custodial staff but they found the residential director to be unresponsive to the students needs.

"The residential director told me to go hang out in the lobby or find some place else to go," said Lewis.

The residential director was unavailable for comment.

But McFadden admitted he had fallen three months behind on his $380 monthly rent after being laid off.

"I know the man needs his monty," McFadden said. "But I offered to pay him what I could. He's just trying to get us evicted."

Evictions don't just happen in poor neighborhoods. Recently, Suffolk County sherriff's deputies tried to serve an eviction notice at a picturesque Victorian home that had been foreclosed upon, only to find the house abandoned.

Toys were strewn around the living room, and neighbors told deputies a woman with children had lived there.

"You wonder, 'Did they leave under darkness of night?'" said Deputy Mark Gaisford. "That's sort of concerning, when you see kids were involved."

Thomas said when he began eviction procedures, the tenant claimed the apartment was in disrepair.

One Boston Globe reporter questioned how a school balances funding between revenue and nonrevenue producing sports? Should a school ask a big revenue-producing sport such as football to fund costly nonrevenue sports for both men and women that may have slight interest, especially if the profits from football are down because of increased costs?

A "measurable commitment"

During an interview last semester, the former Dean of the School of Physical Education David Bischoff, who said the teams were cut due to lack of funds, feels the University is conforming with Title IX, during an interview last semester.

"The institution has a much more measurable commitment to Title IX than any other institution I know," said Bischoff. "There are a lot of mitigating circumstances. I prefer to look at the number of teams we sponsor."

However, Reith feels "there's no way you can justify the cuts. It's crazy. How can you justify cutting three women's team's and one men's team since 1989?"

Former UMass women's tennis coach Edwin Gentzler, who feels there are some "serious problems" regarding UMass conforming to Title IX, agrees.

"When you already have a disproportionate situation (with 70 percent male participation compared to 30 percent female participation) and you cut equal numbers of slots, then you create an even further imbalance which discriminates even more against women."

Confusion on the rules

There is much confusion over the interpretation of the law — and with good reason.

The Office for Civil Rights compares the number of male and female undergraduate students. If the resulting ratios are close, the office considers the school in compliance.

According to the office of Institutional Research and Planning, the Spring 1992 enrollment figures show the campus is equally divided between men and women.

But the number of different undergraduate women participating in varsity sports is approximately 30 percent of the total participation, compared to about 70 percent of the men, according to Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Paul Page.

Looking at alternatives

Reith offered alternatives to the soccer team accepting outside funds to support the team. She said the team could either not accept the money, redistribute existing funds, or raise more money for women's sports.

"(The athletic director) has got to let the alumni know that he has to raise additional money for women's sports or he can't accept the soccer donation," said Reith. "The alumnus should know that he needs their help for creating equal opportunities for women athletes."

"I would like to look and see if there are any other ways of creating equity — it's the right thing to do," said Reith. "There are ways. Schools who have been forced to create gender equity as a result of complaints or lawsuits have found ways to do it."

Editorial/Opinion

Gay lifestyle examined

To those of you who don't know me, my name is Michael Morrissey, and I'm a columnist for the Collegian. Welcome back to what my friend Dan calls "The People's Republic of Amherst." In case you didn't know, the campus and the area are known for their liberalism, but like a fish swimming upstream to spawn, I have devoted my short career to trumpeting the conservative ideal.

In the past, I've written about 200-foot walls (which I am proud to say is part of this year's platform of the Republican Party), abortion, the death penalty, and other such issues that were bound to raise the hair on the backs of those liberals within the Happy Valley.

Michael MORRISSEY

When I came back up to UMass, my friend asked me what my first column would be about. I told him I would speak out against homosexuality, a lifestyle which I felt is frighteningly increasing, even with the specter of AIDS.

Homosexuality goes counter to the human body's natural functions. The male sex organ is obviously not intended to be shoved up another man's behind. The penis was created to A) urinate and B) ejaculate so as to procreate. I can't beat around the bush on this one folls, a fact's a fact.

What bothers me as much as male homosexuals are their female counterparts, lesbians. Again, lesbians feel very strongly about their right to engage in their behavior, which is fine, except their lifestyle has a tendency to carry extra baggage.

It seems to me that many lesbians dream of a "utopia" without men. The only problem is that without men, there would be a world without children, a world without a future.

Listen, these women can rub up against each other as much as they want, but without men, they can't keep the world alive. There would be no fathers or husbands. In other words, their "utopia" would die after one generation.

At this point, I want to emphasize that this is not an essay in gay bashing, but a condemnation of a lifestyle. I have had many people tell me that I want "to kill all gays," but that couldn't be farther from the truth.

The best way I can prove my point is with a metaphor: I don't hate my mother because she smokes two packs of cigarettes a day, nor do I want her dead. I do hate her act of smoking and plead with her to stop, because it is harmful to her and her loved ones. Likewise, I don't hate homosexuals and I could be friends with a homosexual even if I don't agree with his/her lifestyle.

What I find even more disgusting than the acts themselves is the audacity of the people emphasizing their right to engage in this activity. One of the biggest ploys of the homosexuals is their attempt to link their "situation" with that of the Black race.

When they start saying, "We're just like the Blacks, we've been oppressed for so long," alarm bells go off in my head. Blacks in the United States have historically been oppressed because of skin color. Discrimination because of skin color is the worst kind of all, and the gay's plight today can't possibly be compared to the enslavement, lynching and constant persecution of Blacks.

Being a certain skin color is not a moral issue, nor is it something that people could change, even if they wanted to. Gays, on the other hand, engage in acts that a majority of Americans (53 percent) consider to be unacceptable and immoral, according to a Newsweek poll. Homosexuals have full control of their bodily functions and choose this immoral lifestyle.

Now they want "equal rights." We're supposed to not only stand by and watch homosexuals take over our country, but are supposed to actively help them. Americans won't stand for it. In the Newsweek poll, 45 percent said that gay rights are a threat to American family values.

In addition, gays want to teach our children, adopt and raise our orphans, and best of all, lead us in our worship of God. The Bible never mentioned anything about supporting gay rights. I do remember God proclaiming in Corinthians 6:9-10 that neither homosexuals nor sodomites "will inherit the kingdom of God."

Fast forward to 1992, where we make homosexuals our ministers and priests, when they shouldn't be leading us at all. In addition to being morally and possibly legally wrong, homosexuality at best should be a private issue, not one flaunted in public.

Look, all I ask is that if you continue to practice it, realize what you're doing. Being gay, like being straight, isn't something that you should be proud about. Don't tell the world about it, we don't care.

To leave the public with an anatomy lesson, and to quote one of my heroes, Morton Downey, Jr., I can only say, "The anus is an exit, not an entrance."

Michael Morrissey is a Collegian columnist.

Battle for the presidency is a battle over society

While the British media fills its 'silly season' column inches with endless Woody Allen articles, another favorite subject has been temporarily sidelined. The post-modern pursuit of American coverage of the November presidential election can usually be relied upon to raise a few condescending laughs at the expense of those oh-so-frivolous Yanks. Hence the widely held impression that the only difference between Bush and Clinton is as substantial and important as the difference between their wives' much publicized cookie recipes.

Jesse ARMSTRONG

Indeed, in economic terms there is a strong argument for seeing both candidates as deluded, or at least as trying to suspend the disbelief of the nation. Bill Clinton's sums for public works and universal health care out of a tax levy on only the super-rich simply don't add up. Similarly George Bush's "tax cuts across the board" are not even as solid as the fool's gold Clinton described them as, depending as they do on an almost certainly Democratic Congress cutting public spending. In fact, a continued cycle of massive budget deficits seems likely, whoever is responsible for choosing the White House curtains.

What many Britons fail to realize is that the present election battle is important. Some Republicans like to characterize it as a battle over the soul of America, and in a sense it is, though not precisely in their terms. The '92 election battle reveals a conflict between two different conceptions of America, namely: is America moving towards the millenium to be an inclusive or an exclusive society?

It was clear from the right-wing dominated Houston convention that a Republican America is one that, in its conception of itself, excludes atheists, gays, single parents, the pro-choice lobby and that nameless group who Pat Buchanan says must be fought in a "war... block by block" to "take back our culture." One suspects there is little room for Richard Wright, Toni Morrison, Chuck Berry or Chuck D in his definition of "our" culture.

There are signs Clinton is prepared to fight on this battleground, regardless of the inevitable charges of liberalism which will arise from his defense of a holistic, inclusive view of American society. Recently he has referred to "Americans working together and coming together," in contrast to the perceived GOP attempt "at dividing us, at setting us against one another."

Perhaps Bill Clinton should use more than just the rhetoric of unity. Perhaps he should even adopt the distinction between inclusive and exclusive ideas of society. This stance could prove beneficial in two ways. Firstly, it might be the issue to coax out some of the half of the American electorate who normally don't vote (and are disproportionately drawn from racial minorities and the poor). Secondly, a more organic conception of American society might appeal to those moderate Republicans who feel alienated from the rabidly right-wing theocratic wing of their own party, and were not entirely satisfied with use of cuddly-pink Babs Bush as the GOP's universal softening agent in Houston.

It is true that in recent years few politicians have lost elections by overestimating the baseness of the public. However, perhaps '92 is the year principle could triumph over tax-cut promises. Indeed, two facts suggest that this could be the year genuine political sincerity is back in fashion. The first is the unprecedentedly high approval ratings for Jimmy Carter, once reviled as an earnest failure but always viewed as unassailably moral. Likewise the roman candle non-candidacy of Ross Perot proved that the public longed for a leader who had conviction, even if he had no program.

The question of an inclusive or exclusive view of society is far more than an academic concern, or an expendable election issue: an Establishment and society that views certain groups as essentially apart from itself can act with impunity against those groups, and expect few recriminations; and if you think this sounds melodramatic than maybe you haven't heard of a man named Rodney King.

'MAP' and RU486 aren't the same pill

After four years at UMass, I am certainly no fan of University Health Services. I agree with Beverly Beckham (Collegian, Sept. 9) that the lack of privacy in the UHS waiting room is abominable. I am afraid that the privacy issue is the only point on which Ms. Beckham and I concur. In actuality, the issue at hand is not a mere matter of opinion, but one of fact.

Ms. Beckham has unwittingly confused the "M.A.P." (morning after pill) with the so-called abortion pill or RU486. The morning after pill is a series of very high doses of synthetic estrogens, progesterones, or combination pills — all of which are possible components in the common oral contraceptive, or "the pill."

Two-hundred fifty milligrams of Diethylstilbestrol (DES) is the most common treatment and has been widely used as an M.A.P. for over ten years. The pills must be started within three days of unprotected intercourse. They work by making the uterus inhospitable, thereby preventing implantation (see The New Our Bodies Ourselves).

As you can see, the M.A.P. has nothing in common with RU486, which does induce abortion. Otherwise, one would think that we would be hearing much more from Ms. Beckham's allies, the anti-choice activists, on the subject of the M.A.P.

In closing, I wish to add that I am shocked and bewildered that Beverly Beckham's misinformation was overlooked by the editorial boards of both the Boston Herald and the Collegian. One verification call to Health Services would have prevented the dissemination of such drivel.

Have some nostalgia and a Slurpee

It's UMass, early fall of 1992. It's "Africa hot." Your stuff is still not unpacked. There are people everywhere you turn. The Textbook Annex's lines create panic in your veins and you soon discover that there are more late-night food deliveries in the surrounding block than in the entire state of Rhode Island. Your mind is swirling in a sea of random thoughts and expressions.

But wait! It is sunny out, there are still flowers and green grass, and everyone else is stuck in the same boat as you. All of us have the eternal task of unscrambling scrambled eggs. And, yes, it does suck at times.

Kris K. EARLE

Good day to you. This column is specifically dedicated as a smorgasbord of (mis)information, insights, speculation, sarcasm and whatever else I can shoehorn in. The slate is clean, and we may now begin our adventures in learning.

I pulled a joke on my mother the other day. I took all of her Indian corn and stuck it in the air popper. Needless to say, she was a tad upset. But the corn was delicious, if not colorful, with its off-shades of blue, red, orange and Vandyke brown.

Book bags. It is that "autumn" time of year when the kids have to get their moms to cover their books for them. I remember sliding down frozen tundra, my butt seated firmly upon a tightly covered Hemingway. Remember that? Oh, I guess I am the only one who ever got his mother to cover his books for him. I still don't know how to cover a book without tearing the paper four to ten different ways. I am one of those kids who never got the swing of making paper airplanes, those stupid little footballs the boys used to make, or those cool flowers the girls made in junior high that told you who you were going to marry with shivering accuracy. Of course, I wouldn't think the toys asinine if I had ever gotten the hang of producing them in my youth. Forget it, it wasn't important. I just have a constant need to reminisce.

I read a package in the grocery store the other day. It said "Gourmet Hot Dogs." I don't know about you, but to me, there is not nor will there ever be such a discovery as a "Gourmet" Hot Dog. Especially since they are 80 percent fat (that's 20 percent fat free!) and are the only food whose expiration dates come in half-lives. I would really like to meet the idiot who invented the hot dog. "How about a nice hot dog and a beer?" I would rather eat a mouthful of barnacles with tartar sauce.

Now calzones are a whole different story altogether. It is a little known fact that the steak and cheese calzone, along with ambrosia and nectar, was one of the foods consumed by the early Greek gods. After he defeated the Giants and Typhoeus, Zeus was said to have "taken his steak and cheese [calzone] and consumeth it with one hearty bite." And although everyone loved the beautiful Aphrodite, she was said to have "set a special place in heart" for a delightful liver and onion `zone. Alright, maybe that last one is a bit farfetched, but it's as true as the sky is blue.

More and more, I believe I'm living the life of luxury . . . tax. I would like to open a nice reading room with all of the intricacies involved. The works of Dickens, Shakespeare, Twain, and Milton. A nice hardwood floor, soft lighting, a crisp fire crackling in a wood stove, plush 18th century tapestries, perhaps a Rembrant or a Michaelangelo to cover the walls, thick white carpets that keep the feet warm, a few easy chairs. . . and, to top it all off, in the corner of the room between the statue of Venus and the 6th century suit of armor, a nice Slurpee machine with all seven flavors, excluding rainbow.

And with that thought I closeth thy column. But, as the great Douglas MacArthur once said, "I shall return." But bet all your money that I will return much quicker than he did.

Tiny Tate puts a spin on Family Values

By ADAM SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian correspondent

If Orson Welles could direct and act in Citizen Kane why couldn't a woman like Jodie Foster do it, too? Well, she did with Little Man Tate (☆☆☆☆ out of four) which is now on Sounds Easy Video's Top 20 video chart.

In her directorial debut Foster plays Dee Dee Tate, a working class single mother with an illegitimate son Fred (Adam Hann-Byrd) that put Dan Quayle's family values to shame. After all, the seven year old child prodigy is a genius and not a delinquent. Sorry, Dan. Fred can play classical piano songs, he writes his own poetry and can solve math problems virtually every adult couldn't solve. Hey Dan, this kid can even spell. Surprise, surprise! Not bad for a kid being raised by a cocktail waitress.

The mother-son relationship between Foster and Byrd flows beautifully throughout the 99 minute film.

Fred belittles his mother in subtle ways; he questions her to see if she knows what electrons are.

Because Fred is a genius, he is sought out by Dr. Jane Grierson (Dianne Wiest, Parenthood) to join her Odyssey of the World seminar in Orlando, Florida.

Wiest's character is very strong and may well be one of her finest films to date. In Parenthood, Wiest portrayed a neurotic mother who was sexually deprived. Her character never really got a chance to develop; she was a mess and stayed a mess. On the other hand, in Little Man Tate Wiest's character is an intelligent woman that happens to be a workaholic. She becomes caught up in her work to the point that she doesn't know what is going on in her personal life. It is through Fred that Dr. Grierson realizes she herself is unhappy and lonely. In this scene, Fred asks Dr. Grierson why she isn't married, and she has no respnose. It is here that Wiest's character reaches a turning point. She realizes that she is just as lonely and unhappy as her students.

Wiest's character pushes Ms. Tate to allow Fred to enroll in her seminar.

Foster's character becomes livid and snaps, "I don't even know you. Now, why would I let you take my son on some trip, let alone let you enroll him anywhere." Eventually, Foster decides to let Fred enroll in The Grierson Institute's program for remarkable children.

In Orlando, Fred meets bratty Damon (P.J. Ochlan) also enrolled in the program. Damon becomes Fred's friend. Fred's wish is just to have someone to eat lunch with at school.

When Fred's mother tries to plan a birthday party Fred exclaims, "Why don't we go to McDonalds like we did last year." Fred doesn't want a party because he knows nobody will show especially after being left in the school yard with tossed away invites from fellow classmates.

In a moving scene, Foster asks her son if he wants to go to Disney World for the summer or college. Fred quickly responds by saying that he's already been to Disney.

Fred misses out on Epcot, pizza and cotton candy; instead, he lives with Dr. Grierson. He is placed on a macrobiotic diet. Like most kids, Fred asks for a coke, pukes the shake and then is told by Dr. Grierson the Cokes are in the fridge. Wiest's character tries to be a mother to the latch key boy but Fred rebels.

While at college, Fred encounters the GDI (god damn independent) anti-fraternity Eddie (Harry Connick, Jr.). Although Connick Jr.'s role is miniscule, his character shows Fred how to be a kid.

Despite the fact that Little Man Tate is slow moving, the ending makes up for the slight boredom that may be caused to the viewer. If you're looking for a comedy this movie isn't for you. If you want to see a fine work of art that tells a charming story of a small child searching for happiness then Little Man Tate is the film to rent. The film comes to a close at Fred's eighth birthday party where he can finally be happy. Something we all stride for. And for Dan, next time think before you decide to speak.

Words and Pictures: unabashed comics fun

By KIP MANLEY
Collegian Correspondent

Bone
by Jeff Smith
Cartoon Books

It's hard not to be hyperbolic when talking about Bone. Hard-boiled comics professionals, people who have seen everything twice over in this curious little corner of the entertainment industry, have been turned into gushing fanboys at the mere mention of its name. This is because Bone is nothing less than pure unabashed comics fun. This is what you get when you do it right.

The story is simple enough, being an adventure strip in a whimsically fantastic vein — a classic formula, really, with a long line of progenitors. Our protagonist, Fone Bone, and his two cousins have gotten lost and separated in the wilderness, and as they try to find each other and the way back home they have, well, adventures.

We get to see almost everything and meet almost everyone for the first time through Fone's eyes, as he does — the voraciously carnivorous rat-creatures, the protective but caustic dragon, and Thorn, who knows more than she remembers, and her Grandmother Ben, the war veteran who races cows. There is a plot, involving the machinations of the rat-creatures and their mysterious hooded leader against the dragon for the Bone cousins, but it is kept flowing along in the background and unfolds leisurely enough to allow us time to explore the setting, characters, and situations. This exploration is where Smith's real strength as a writer lies. His sense of timing is superb, and he's not afraid to let a scene take four or five pages to get where it is going so that each moment happens in its proper time.

As for the art, well — Bone has, quite simply, some of the best new cartooning I've seen in years. His line is clean and clear, and the art effortlessly walks the tightrope between fine detail and loose expressiveness. The action scenes are beautifully choreographed, and in the quieter moments, the characters communicate as much about themselves through body language and facial expression as through words. Smith spent five years running his own animation studio before beginning Bone, and the experience shows. This comic reads very much like an animated movie at times. The art is so good, so clear, so right that you forget that someone had to draw it.

But it's difficult to keep repeating variations on the theme of "Bone is really, really good." It's always hard to write about something you like. You lose all objectivity and become hyperbolic. You begin to gush. Besides, people would much rather read about the problems something has. You know — where the author screwed up.

Fortunately, Smith doesn't. At least, not much. Fone's crush on Thorn is handled at times with a heavy-handed coyness that I could do without, and the two weakest characters are Phoney and Smiley, Fone's cousins. Phoney relies too much on the cliches of the wealthy miser to be truly funny, especially given the amount of time he has in the spotlight, and the way Smiley suddenly disappears from sight and then just as suddenly re-appears is too abrupt and leaves us with a feeling of not really knowing him at all. As central characters, especially of a story like Bone, they ought to be delineated more carefully and originally.

Ultimately, there is something ineffable about Bone's appeal, something impossible to communicate without handing you an issue and allowing you to read for yourself. It isn't a socially relevant comic, and it isn't the Great American Graphic Novel. It doesn't have an attitude. It certainly isn't cool or hip — it's downright charming and delightful.

A cursory flip through Bone might cause it to be dismissed as a "children's book" (a dangerous precedent, as some of the best stories in the world were written for children), but it certainly isn't an "adult book," either. Those of you who are lucky enough to have read and enjoyed the original Pogo by the late, great Walt Kelly will definitely recognize a kindred spirit in these pages. What Jeff Smith has accomplished with Bone is to tell a simple story very well indeed, and this is a rare and difficult feat.

Bone began last summer, and so far only five issues have come out, but there are many, many more to come and for this we can only be grateful. This is what you get when you do it right. Go out and pick up a copy for yourself.

Bone is available at local comic book stores, or write to BONE, c/o Cartoon Books, PO Box 212, Worthington, Oh. 4085, for subscription information.

There's a lot more than a great calculator waiting for you when you purchase an HP 48SX or an HP 48S between June 1, 1992, and October 31, 1992. You'll get a bonus book that's good for free software, a free PC link cable and hundreds of dollars back on applications—like electrical and mechanical engineering—memory cards, training tools, games, and HP's infrared printer.

It's a really big offer. Worth more than $500. And it's going to make your HP 48 calculator even more valuable to you. The free serial cable lets you exchange information with your PC. And the free software disk lets you enter and plot equations easily, do 3D plotting, and analyze polynomials.

Beyond all the bonuses, you'll have the right calculator for your most challenging classes. HP 48 calculators have over 2100 built-in functions and offer a unique combination of graphics and calculus.

Head over to the campus bookstore now. After all, you don't see this kind of deal every day. HP calculators. The best for your success.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You cannot afford to be overextended financially now. Small successes come without much effort. Use your advantageously. Diplomacy helps you avoid tedious arguments.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): An opportune day to contact people in authority and seek their approval of a pet project. Your chances of success are excellent! An ingenious idea will boost your income to new heights.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Friends, relatives and business associates are all willing to help out. Almost before you voice a need, you will see it fulfilled. A loved one deserves extra attention.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): An exciting period of growth starts now. Expand your horizons! The relationships you nurture this fall will play a wonderful role in your future. Consult experts if you do not have all the answers.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Plans could change abruptly; it pays to remain flexible. A heavy workload may have you running in circles. Delegate routine job tasks wherever possible.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Higher-ups demand perfection now. You can give it to them by ensuring vital tasks are completed on time. Get your home life in order so that you can concentrate on business.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Important issues come up for discussion. You may not know how to answer. Seek the counsel of both experts and trusted allies. Ask for more time if unable to make up your mind.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A conflict of interest could endanger a powerful partnership. There is more to a business deal than meets the eye. Avoid going overboard on home remodeling or redecorating.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You have the words and wherewithal to enhance romance or test a flight of fancy. Go for it; he-hold! If entertaining soon, get your home spic and span.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Give some thought to discarding certain outdated ideas or routines. Your suspicions about money matter could cloud your judgement later today. Avoid making any transactions.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Fresh financial gains could be related to last week's developments or to a new business venture. In any case, you have the inside lead on a clever moneymaking scheme. Be very discreet.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Break loose from the domestic scene and step into the world of business. Your efforts will be highly appreciated. Influential people seek your opinion.

Field hockey wins home opener

Minutewomen breeze through New Hampshire, 1-0

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team, sporting a number of new looks in its home opener, routinely disposed of the University of New Hampshire in old fashion Saturday, winning 1-0.

The Minutewomen (2-0) shut down the Wildcats (0-1) all day, allowing UNH only two or three good scoring opportunities while putting 24 shots and nine penalty corners on UNH goalie Jen Bouchie.

UMass' lone goal came with 32:17 left in the first half on a quick flurry. Tara Jelley, Holly Hockenbrock and Jenn Salisbury converged on net, and when Bouchie went down for a save, Salisbury knocked the loose ball rebound in from the right side of the goal for the lone tally.

The Minutewomen had a number of chances both in the first and second halves, but could not capitalize on three or four centering passes right in front of the UNH net.

"I guess the missed opportunities would be more frustrating if we lost," said UMass head coach Pam Hixon. "We spent a little too much time delivering the ball and just couldn't pull the trigger."

The defense played extremely well in limiting UNH, with contributions coming from Barclay, Ainslee Press, Natalie Hart, and co-captains Kathy Phelan and Joy Blenis.

Unfortunately, the UMass penalty corner sputtered all day, with the forwards unable to even get a shot off. The penalty corner is considered one of field hockey's top offensive weapons, but on the Totman Field grass the ball does not roll quite as smooth as on artificial turf, the predominant surface of collegiate field hockey.

"We'll stick with the same personnel on the penalty corner," said Hixon. "I think we need to execute it with confidence, but our options are good. This was our first game on grass, remember."

The Minutewomen sported a number of new twists in their home opener, including new positions for Hockenbrock (who moved back and forth between midfield and forward) and defenseman Tracy Barclay, who was the team's sweeper last year.

Totman Field was also modified for the new season, with new bleachers and flagpole in place and the turf "the best it's ever been," according to groundskeepers.

UMass would get the ball back three plays later, but could put nothing together, returning the ball to the 'Hens with 10:39 left.

The Blue Hen offense took over at the Delaware 39, capping the seven play, 76-yard drive with a one-yard Hicks run with nine seconds left for the 33-13 final.

Game Notes-The Minutemen moved Scott Assencoa from his spot at outside linebacker to inside linebacker and were without the services of starting center Andy LeBlanc, whose knee is injured.

Women's soccer wins two in Classic fashion

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team had a stellar weekend, defeating both William and Mary on Saturday and St. Mary's on Sunday and winning the UMass Classic.

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The ninth ranked University of Massachusetts women's soccer team had a few periods of sluggish play but managed to post two shutout victories at the UMass Classic this weekend.

On Saturday, Massachusetts (3-0) played a physical defensive style to defeated No. 12 William and Mary 1-0. Yesterday, the Minutewomen poured on the offense as they beat St. Mary's (CA) 4-0.

"I am happy to get these two wins," Massachusetts coach Jim Rudy said. "We have got a ways to go but these wins feel great. It wasn't always stylish but it was a nice emotional lift."

The big lift came from the victory over a strong William and Mary team. Massachusetts was able to shut down a potent Tribe attack with some tough defensive play. Skye Eddy started in net and made three saves as she recorded her first shutout of the year.

The defense was able to neutralize the attack of Natale Neaton, who entered the game with four goals so far this season, by denying her access to the play. Neaton was covered by Holly Hellmuth, but midfielders Amy Trunk and Heidi Kocher were instrumental in keeping the play from developing.

"We did a good job keeping the play from her," Rudy said. "Neaton is big time and she can turn on a dime and beat you, so you can not give her any room to maneuver."

Kocher said, "We were able to keep the play from the midfielders and that kept the [William and Mary] offense from getting free."

Massachsetts was able to get the only goal of the game in the 37th minute. Trunk retrieved a loose ball left of the net and popped it up in front. Freshman Nicole Roberts headed it across the goal mouth where Kim Eynard dove and redirected the ball into the net with her head.

The game was physical throughout and culminated in the 54th minute with a scuffle between Eynard and William and Mary's Jenn Baumann. The two had collided heavily and then banged as they battled for a loose ball. After the whistle Baumann wrestled Eynard to the ground and was promptly rewarded with a red card, and a game misconduct. Eynard received a yellow caution card.

Tribe coach John Daly was upset with the officiating which had let the physical play go until it was out of hand.

"The game was officiated weakly," Daly said. "It frustrated both teams and it got rougher as a result. An experienced official would have handled the tussle differently. It was their inconsistency which led to that happening."

In Sunday's contest, the Minutewomen exploded in the second half as they pumped in four goals in a span of 15 minutes.

"In the second half we played a much simpler style," Kocher said. "We were able to shift the field and open things up."

The opened up field resulted in goals by Eynard, Polly Hackathorn, Paula Wilkins and Roberts' first career tally.

Wilkins' score was a 40-yard direct kick which she served up and eluded a crowd of players. The William and Mary keeper was screened and the ball went untouched into the net.

"My father asked me to score this weekend because my parents had never seen me score in college," Wilkins said. "I did not expect it to go in. I was just serving it up."

UMass drops season opener to Blue Hens

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

NEWARK, Del.- Down 12-0 with just over twelve minutes left in the second quarter and the University of Delaware's famed Wing T offense driving into Minuteman territory, it appeared the University of Massachusetts football team was heading nowhere, fast.

The only thing was that someone forgot to tell the Minutemen this. As the UMass' defense (led by Phil Lartigue with 20 tackles) tightened and redshirt freshmen quarterback Andrew McNeilly led the UMass offense to 13 unanswered points and a surprising 13-12 halftime lead over the heavily favored Fightin' Blue Hens.

From there University of Delaware fullback Daryl Brown took matters into his own hands, rushing for 104 of his career high 183 yards in the second half as the Blue Hen offense exploded for a 33-13 season opening victory over the Minutemen before a crowd of 17,299 at Delaware Stadium on Saturday.

"I'm very proud of the effort our kids gave today," head coach Mike Hodges said. "We gave them [Delaware] a run for a while, we just couldn't hold up in the second half. We still haven't solved the Wing T and I don't know if we ever will, especially the way they run it."

UMass' inability to solve the Wing T became evident right from the opening gun, as Delaware capped a nine play, 79 yard drive when Lanue Johnson scampered two yards around the left end for a 6-0 Blue Hen lead.

Five minutes later, Brown took a five-yard dump pass from Blue Hen QB Bill Vergantino and raced 65 yards with it, putting Delaware up 12-0 as the two point conversion try failed.

"It [the Wing T] is very hard to defend against, and I don't think that we've ever stopped Delaware on the opening drive of a game," Hodges said. "Our kids didn't give up, we were down 12-0 and it didn't even faze them. They just kept fighting and I'm very proud of the effort they gave."

After a Blue Hen turnover with 12:46 left in the half, McNeilly (8 of 18, 119 yards, 1 interception) hit split end Matt Read with a 44 yard scoring strike over All-American free safety Warren McIntire, cutting the Delaware lead to 12-7.

McNeilly, the first freshmen to start the season as QB for a UMass team, directed the Minuteman offense with great poise under heavy pressure from the Blue Hen defense, scrambling for 41 yards while keeping UMass close for most of the game.

The Minutemen took the lead after Delaware punter Brian Meyers fell on a bad snap at the Blue Hen 4-yard line, setting up first and goal for the Minutemen.

One play later, John Johnson (13 rushes for 52 yards) barreled in from the four for a 13-12 UMass lead, as a nervous hush fell over Delaware Stadium.

Delaware and UMass traded turnovers for the remaining seven minutes of the first half, and the Minutemen headed for the locker room with the scant one point lead.

"We got ourselves back into the game," Hodges said. "At halftime we thought we had the opportunity to make some adjustments and maybe win the game, and things just didn't work out in the end."

Delaware scored fourteen third quarter points, including a seven yard Vergantino TD scramble, taking a 26-13 lead before the Minuteman recovered.

After a Scott Assencoa interception to end the third quarter, UMass drove to the Blue Hen eighteen yard line, where McNeilly fumbled the snap on fourth down, effectively ending UMass' hopes for victory.

Minutemen crush Owls 6-1

Men's soccer pummel A-10 rival Temple

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

My how one year can make a difference. At this time last year the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team was playing the Temple University Owls to a 0-0 tie io Philadelphia. At home on Saturday, however, the Minutemen outplayed the Owls in every facet of the game on the way to a 6-1 victory.

UMass set the tempo very early in the game, as Gary Jacobs hit the goalpost nearly two minutes into the contest. Six minutes later at the 8:58 mark Steve Scott took a pass from Colin Johnson and beat Temple goalie Pat Kivlin to give the Minutemen a 1-0 lead.

Things stayed quiet for the next twenty minutes with UMass controlling the tempo but unable to score. That changed when Justin Edelman scored on a direct kick rebound. With nearly six minutes remaining in the half junior co-captain Sean Blue came out of a muddled mess to beat Kivlin and give UMass a comfortable 3-0 lead going into the half.

In the second half, the Minutemen continued to pressure Kivlin and junior co-captain and leading scorer Todd Kylish scored at the 47:46 mark. This goal, which made the score 4-0, came on assists from Edelman and Josh Pittman.

The scoring barrage did not cease there as Bradford Miller would take a pass from Blue and put one by Kivlin to make the score 5-0. Randy Jacobs topped off the Minutemen scoring when he blew one by Kivlin on a penalty kick.

Temple finally got on the scoreboard when junior Martin Richmond deposited a Chris Cotton pass into the net to wrap up the games' scoring.

Much like their previous game against UNH, the Minutemen had a physical game on their hands. Temple's Joe Gogola bid farewell after picking up a red card for some extra-curricular activites. UMass' Hossein Giahi also picked up a yellow card in the first half.

The six goal explosion overshadowed the solid job the Minutemen defense did. Wolf faced only seven shots the whole night. Midway through the second half, Wolf dazzled everyone with a leaping save of a Temple shot.

UMass head coach Sam Koch said he was happy with his team's performance.

"Anytime you win a game 6-1 you have to be pleased with that," he said. "We played a good, solid team today. I'm surprised we beat them 6-1, we just didn't do to many things wrong."

Freshman Colin Johnson, who had two assists, said, "We were the underdogs, I think that's what fired us up. We cam out and did the job, everyone played well."

The Minutemen raised their record to 3-0 with the victory. Their next game comes at home against Holy Cross on Tuesday at 3:30 p.m.

Proposal fell short for Upward Bound

By TAMI MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

In the wake of news that federal funding to Upward Bound had been eliminated, Bryant Lewis, former assistant director of the program, alleges that the University's "recycling" of a grant originally written in 1982 directly resulted in the loss of funding.

Upward Bound is a program designed to help keep underprivileged youths in school and prepare them for higher education. The U.S. Department of Education had previously provided $241,000 towards the cost of the program, with an additional $85,000 funded by the University.

Several sources question the proposal's content, citing inadequacies.

A letter to Chancellor Richard O'Brien from the U.S. Department of Education says, "Within the body of the review [of the proposal], both readers indicate myriad weaknesses of the application including vague objectives, lack of community support, lack of student evaluation instruments, and a sketchy project design to support their scores."

"The program had tremendous community support," Lewis said, citing this was evidence that the grant did not adequately represent the programs strengths.

The letter, written by John B. Childers, deputy assistant secretary for higher education programs, also said, "The review of the application confirms that the application was poorly written and did not specifically or adequately address all the published selection criteria.

"In the overall summary evaluating the quality of the application, each reader refers to the lack of organization of the proposal as well as the lack of information requested," Childers wrote.

Lewis said that in previous years the staff of the program had been allowed to participate in the writing of the grant, but that their input was not sought this time.

"A lot of information could have gone in to make the proposal stronger," he said. "The staff voiced concern for the need for a strong proposal."

Lewis said he felt the proposal should have been completely rewritten. "I forewarned them not to do this."

The decision to resubmit the grant was made by Ann Quinley, who served last semester as dean of academic support services, and Gloria DeGuevara, who served as associate dean of academic support services and is currently head of personnel in that office.

Neither Quinley nor DeGuevara were available for comment.

Lewis said that of the 90.5 points the grant received, 13.5 were received for "prior experience."

"We scored high as a result of the work that has been done, not on the strength of the proposal," Lewis said. "It's an easy cop-out to

Janitor crisis disputed

Auxiliary head claims 'false rumors'

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Refuse in the Campus Center concourse after a usual day of traffic.

By TAMI MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

Responding to reports that janitors in the Campus Center/Student Union complex were overworked and understaffed and calling in sick as a result, Ashoke Ganguli, director of Auxiliary Services, said there are more than enough janitors and the problem is the way staff is managed.

Senior Building Services Manager Forrest Davies expressed concern earlier this week for the janitors being overworked.

"[Davies has] got more janitors than any other student union at any other school," said Ganguli.

Ganguli said that students pay for the service and maintenance of the buildings and his priority is to keep student costs down.

His responseto reports that maintenance employees were fatigued from overwork and were calling in sick as a form of protest to staff cuts was that the information was distorted.

"These are all false rumors," said Ganguli, referring to allegations that Building Services was understaffed. "[Davies] has over 30 janitors between three shifts. He has more than enough staff."

But Forrest Davies, director of Building Services, disagreed.

"When I came here we had 21 custodians on the 7-11 shift. That number has slowly been decreasing," said Davies. "Now we are down to 13 on that shift."

Davies said that he has 51 full-time permanent employees for all of his divisions' various functions.

The various jobs include maintenance, security, staffing the information desk, furnishing audio/visual equipment and business duties.

He said in addition to the 51 full-time employees he has help from student employees.

Davies said Building Services employees work in the Campus Center/Student Union Complex as well as at Hadley Farm, the four dining commons, the Butterfield kitchen and the various snack bars on campus.

But Ganguli says the problem lies in how staff is managed and assigned to shifts.

"These are all false rumors. [Davies] has more than enough staff."
Ashoke Ganguli
Auxiliary Services Director

"More people should be assigned to the night shift when the major cleaning is done," said Ganguli.

"I've been asking them to do the cleaning at night, like they do at Iowa State," Ganguli said, referring to reports he has solicited from other colleges and universities on how they handle maintenance of student unions and similar complexes.

Davies said this would require taking permanent workers off of the day shift when they set up rooms and replacing them with student workers.

"I don't think we can get enough hours from students to do set-up. We need a crew that's readily available," Davies said.

"I'm willing to try with students. We've made arrangements to switch people to the night shift," he said.

Ganguli confirmed reports that he will be hiring three new permanent workers.

Florida residents lend hand in Iniki aftermath

By JEFFREY ULBRICH
Associated Press

MIAMI — South Florida, still mired in the painful aftermath of its own hurricane, has extended a helping hand to faraway Hawaiian neighbors ravaged by a monster named Iniki.

"We wrote the book on being a disaster area," said Muxo, whose small, sun-kissed city hall now looks like a military command post. "And we've received so much help and assistance from all over the country. We're now in a position to give some help to someone else."

The city manager said he could send three or four key people to Hawaii to pass along what Homestead has learned about disaster relief. He said he tried to contact the Hawaii governor's office but hasn't been successful.

"Even if they got us on a conference call it would be beneficial. We've sort of become the guinea pig of disaster," he said.

Other disaster relief workers said they were still too busy here to do much for Hawaii.

"We have got all we can do putting these people back on their feet," said Betty Spillers, a volunteer nurse in south Florida.

In Homestead, officials ordered outsiders, including construction workers who came to Florida to help rebuild, to move out of the military-run tent cities by today. Florida City, another hard-hit community just to the south, was expected to carry out similar evictions soon.

Both communities fear that as building inspectors begin to work their way through storm-ravaged neighborhoods condemning unsafe homes, more residents will need to move into the tent camps.

Alan Bray, a painter from Richmond, IN, was packed and ready to go. But he was also steamed.

"In the papers up north they are begging for people to come here," Bray said Sunday as he lounged on one of 16 cots in a tent for single men.

He and others said they would be happy to pay rent, but there was nothing available. So they had taken the only accomodation around — free tents provided for people whose homes were destroyed.

"If I have to leave here, I'll have to go to jail," Bray said. "There are no hotels. If you pitch a tent out there it's illegal. You'd have to go to Fort Lauderdale if you want to drive 140 miles."

Don Schenk, a roofer from Manassas, Va., who hitchhiked to Homestead with an idea of perhaps getting a job and staying, said: "We're working here, yes, but we're spending our money here, too."

"I thought there was a future down here, I really did," he said. "They could do something besides kick you out of the city of Homestead."

Robery Barrett, Florida City's assistant city manager, said the area does not need outside labor. South Florida already had high unemployment and the local work pool is sufficient to meet the need, he said.

Boston deceased cast ballots

BOSTON (AP) — A review of city election records and state death certificates indicates that about 13 votes were cast from beyond the grave since 1988.

But there is no evidence that these dead voters changed the outcome of a particular election, and in most cases, the problems resulted from "clerical errors or oversight" the Boston Sunday Herald reported.

Also, at least three others who cast ballots have registered addresses on vacant plots of land, the Herald reported.

The examples raised questions about procedures used to prevent voter fraud.

John Donovan Sr., chief assistant registrar of voters, defended the department's safeguards and insisted that no elections were compromised. But he promised to review the findings. "I most definitely will look into this," he said.

Several cases resulted from registration errors involving people with similar names. In one case, Ethel M. O'Brien of West Roxbury voted six times by absentee ballot and in person, between 1988 and 1991. But state records show that O'Brien died on May 21, 1984, at age 92.

However, her daughter — whose name is the same — has actually cast the votes, although she wasn't aware of the mix up.

Poll workers use street lists that include each registered voters' year of birth and the height. In the O'Brien case, workers checked the younger woman through for each election although she is 31 years younger and four inches shorter than her mother's description. She said she has never been questioned.

"Hopefully, I don't look like I was born in 1891," she said.

Other cases are tougher to explain. City records indicate Joaquim P. Fernandez voted in the 1988 general election, although he died more than a decade earlier. No other family members were listed at that address and the current resident, Michael W. Johnson, said he didn't know whether anyone by that name had ever lived there.

Frank D. Porfido of East Boston voted in the 1990 general election, although he died nearly three years earlier. "I wonder now if someone is using my husband's name" to cast a vote, said his widow, Adeline Porfido. A former poll worker herself, Porfido said she informed election officials about her husband's death.

State law requires communities to review their voter rolls annually by contacting every household. Town and city clerks are also required to send monthly records on all deaths to election officials so that the names can be removed from voting lists.

Several other voters were listed as living vacant lots, often where their previous homes had burned or been leveled.

Correction:

Due to a reporting error, an article in last Wednesday's issue incorrectly stated that Jennifer Wood thought faculty pay raises would "dampen statewide support of the University." It was President Michael Hooker's salary that Wood was referring to, not faculty pay raises. The Collegian regrets the error.

Four University professors to receive Fulbright grants

By JENNIFER L. PRESS
Collegian Correspondent

Four University of Massachusetts professors have been named recipients of the prestigious Fulbright Grants which will allow them to spend the 1992-1993 academic year studying, teaching, and conducting research abroad.

James K. Boyce, associate professor of economics, will be spending his year in Costa Rica helping to establish an environmental economics concentration within the National University for Central America and the Caribbean.

Through his teachings, he will try to comply with Costa Rica's environmental policies while analyzing and devising new strategies for the country's economy.

Although Costa Rica is known for protecting much of its land, rainforests have been cleared for grazing, mining, and farming. Boyce will research the financial repercussions of plant and animal extinction as well as soil erosion resulting from this deforestation.

Lawrence Zacharias, associate professor of law and policy in the School of Management, recently joined American faculty in Germany in order to study the effects of German reunification, including developments in the country's government, business, and social institutions.

The group recently met with leading government officials and business executives to explain their findings and ideas, which are now being integrated into Germany's federal political system and market economy.

Zacharias was chosen to participate in the seminar because of his interest in the restructuring of industry that occurred when Germany became liberated.

At the University of San Carlos in Guatemala City, Guatemala, professor Thomas E. Redlinger will lecture on plant biotechnology. Redlinger, a visiting University assistant professor of biochemistry and molecular biology, will be back at the University of Massachusetts next Spring. Upon his return, he plans to share his experience and teach laboratory classes on biochemical and molecular biological techniques.

David M. Bloome, associate professor in the School of Education, will lecture at the University of Sussex in Brighton, England.

Bloome, a specialist in reading and writing, is the editor of 'Linguistics and Education: An International Research Journal' and co-author of a chapter on literacy in a recently published book, 'Multidisciplinary Perspectives on Literary Research'.

The Fulbright Program awards about 5,000 grants each year to American students, teachers, and scholars to study, teach, and conduct research in more than 130 countries.

Individuals are selected on the basis of academic and professional qualifications as well as their ability and willingness to share their ideas and experiences with people of diverse cultures.

Voting drive to be held

SGA, MassPIRG to conduct registration

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

Students are encouraged to participate in the expanded three-day voter registration drive to be held on campus next week, according to organizers.

Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group and the Student Government Association are working together to coordinate the registration which will take place Sept. 22, 23 and 24 in the Cape Cod Lounge from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m.

"I encourage everyone to get involved in campus and town issues."
Matt Pavesi
MassPIRG

"I encourage all first-year students and everyone to participate in the voter registration drive and to get involved in campus and town issues," said Matt Pavesi, the Chair of the Public Policy Committee who is organizing for the event. "We can definitely have a voice if we just get involved."

Last year, students could only register on campus one day through the Amherst Registrar. This year, students are being recruited to attend a training session to become official assistant registrars or deputies to help other students register. Any registered voter from the town of Amherst may become a deputy according to the campus organizer and member of MASSPIRG Heidi Hill.

"It's the biggest voter registration drive of the year," said Hill.

MASSPIRG and SGA are aiming to register at least 2,000 students according to Hill. Pavesi said the group is also hoping to register students throughout the year at Off Campus Housing. Hill estimates not more than 500 students were registered last year.

MASSPIRG, a non-partisan group, has their own specific goal as well. Hill said the organization is trying to get a large student voter turnout to pass a recycling initiative to ban wasteful packaging, which will be question #3 this year on the ballot.

"We hope to have a stronger relationship with the Amherst Registrar so the process can continue to be successful," added Hill.

The training session to become deputies will be held Sept. 21 in the Bangs Community Center from 7-9. More information may be obtained by contacting the SGA office.

UMass profs study moth virus

By HOPE D. TAYLOR
Collegian Correspondent

The annual gypsy moth outbreak has been a problem in New England for many years. They appear by the thousands with seemingly no way to get rid of them except to patiently wait for the season to end. This waiting around may be coming to a finish, as entomologists at the University of Massachusetts are studying a virus that kills the caterpillars.

The virus is called nuclear polyhedrosis virus (NPV), and though harmful to gypsy moths, is not toxic to humans. University entomologists Greg Dwyer, Joseph Elkinton, and John Burand are assessing its effectiveness through numerous field experiments. They have found that the virus spreads more quickly than expected and Dwyer offers one possible explanation.

According to the entomologists, younger caterpillars are carried by the wind for a longer period of time than had been originally believed. They also claimed that this factor may have to be incorporated into their model to accurately predict the rate of the spread of the virus.

Eventually, the United States Department of Agriculture Forest Service plans to release a genetically engineered form of the virus through controlled spraying. Researchers have found that the production of the virus is very costly and lacks a commercial producer.

Elkinton, who has studied the population dynamics of gypsy moths for eight years feels that one possible way to make the virus more economical is to increase its strength in a concentrated formula.

On August 13, Dwyer presented the findings of the University studies at a symposium at the annual meeting of the Ecological Society of America in Honolulu, Hawaii. The symposium focused on developing models to apply theory to ecological problems and dynamics and Dwyer's presentation was entitled, "Host dispersal and the Special Spread of Insect Pathogens: How do pathogens move so fast?"

Unavailable for comment on results of the symposium, Dwyer will be returning to Amherst at the end of September, where continued research and development of the model is expected.

Greek Area begins recruitment for fall

By CHRISTINA THORPE
Collegian Correspondent

This semester's fraternity and sorority rush has arrived.

For those of you unfamiliar with the Greek Area, rush is the process by which houses conduct their membership recruitment. For women, this fall's formal sorority rush begins with an orientation meeting Wednesday at 5pm in Campus Center 1009.

The Greek Area

Christine Palmer, a junior math and Latin double major as well as a UMass Greek, is looking forward to a positive Greek rush. "The whole Greek Area is excited about rush this semester. Through dorm storming and DC sign-up we have reached many interested women which will make for a more successful rush," said Palmer.

"I feel, as do the other women in the Greek Area, that a successful rush will bring us many diverse and wonderful women who will be assets to the Greek Area as a whole."

In order to participate, women register in their Dining Common or just show up for the orientation.

Sorority rush allows the "rushee" to visit all chapters on campus under the supervision of a unbiased party, the National Panhellenic Council.

Monique Nash, President of Panhellenic Council, recommended rush for several reasons.

"Being involved in the Greek Area provides the opportunity to meet new people and to make UMass smaller and more comfortable," she said. She referred to her own experience as a Greek as her "main interaction with quality friendships with other women."

There are no minimum overall GPA requirements to attend fall rush, however most houses will not except pledges with lower then a 2.0 or a 2.2 GPA.

As well, rush is open to all university women, including freshman. Rush will end Saturday, September 26th — entitled Bid Day — with day-long activities.

Less structured then sorority rush, informal fraternity rush begins Tuesday, September 15th and lasts until the 29th.

Eric Morell is the Rush Chair for the Interfraternity Council and a junior political science major.

"I encourage all undergraduate men to stop by during informal rush and check out each individual house and see the advantages that the Greek Area has to offer," Morell said.

"In the past few years the Greek Area has had dramatic increases in membership, and this year is no exception as there are many interested rushees," he said.

As with all other rushes, according to the IFC's President, Jeff Turco, this semester's rush is alcohol-free.

Jeff describes rush as an opportunity for the men to learn the history of the fraternities, tour the houses, meet the brothers, and perhaps to dispel some of the myths associated with the Greek Area.

Men who wish to rush should call or stop by the houses they are interested in visiting.

Crime statistics show campus reality

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

Dana Getzinger was stabbed and nearly died when a ski-masked stranger tried to rape her while she was a sophomore at the University of Georgia. She learned later, she says, that she wasn't the first.

The attack on her was at least the fifth within three months on students in her neighborhood near the campus.

"The universities tell you nothing," she said. "Schools are placing greater importance on their image than on students safety."

More than 4,000 violent crimes — among them 16 murders and 493 rapes — were reported last year to security officials at the nation's largest universities and colleges, according to figures being released this month under new federal disclosure laws.

It is the first time all universities and colleges have been required to reveal campus crime statistics, which most private institutions previously kept confidential.

"Parents and prospective students have not been appropriately informed that there is crime on campus," said Joe Griffin, Northeastern University police chief and president of the International Association of Campus Law Enforcement Administrators.

"Part of their sales pitch was, 'Come to this idyllic, safe-appearing campus,' " said Dorothy Siegel, director of the Campus Violence Prevention Center at Towson State University in Maryland. "They are not recognizing that gradually crime was creeping in."

The new federal Campus Security Act requires crime statistics be made available to students, faculty, staff and prospective students and their parents. Every school must publish and distribute a description of security procedures and statistics for the previous three years, or risk losing eligibility for federal funding.

Those documents are being handed out to students on most campuses this month.

"The most difficult in dealing with violent crime is convincing people that it will happen," said Marvin Herrington, chief of police at Stanford University, where an employee was fatally shot on campus Tuesday. "You get lulled into a false sense of security."

But victim advocates are questioning the value of statistics furnished by some universities and colleges.

"If the initial reports are that crime is vastly below what we're seeing in broader society, I would be very skeptical of that," said David Beatty, spokesman for the National Victim Center.

say 'the feds wouldn't fund it.' "

On Sept. 10 Chancellor Richard O'Brien announced journalism professor Nicholas McBride had accepted an assignment to develop a proposal for services similar to Upward Bound's.

"The University remains committed to promoting efforts that seek to keep students in school and working toward a college education," O'Brien said. "I am optimistic Mr. McBride will be able to outline ways for us to demonstrate commitment."

"You have to try to do something, no matter how desperate the situation," said McBride.

McBride will work with Jo-Anne Vanin, dean of students and associate vice chancellor for student affairs.

Study cites bias in the EPA

NEW BEDFORD, Mass. (AP) — The Environmental Protection Agency cleans up hazardous waste sites in poor neighborhoods more slowly than in other areas, according to a study.

The National Law Journal, in an eight-month analysis of EPA records, also said penalties against polluters in minority and low-income areas were less severe.

The results are "islands of pollution" where minorities and low-income families live, the study said.

John G. Andrade, a community activist, and a group, Hands Across the River, oppose the EPA's plan to burn about 120 tons of toxic PCBs from the Acushnet River, saying the measure would expose the city to risks the agency would never impose on a more affluent community.

"The term a lot of people are using now is 'toxic racism,' " Andrade said.

Marianne Lavelle, an author of the journal study, said the EPA seemed to respond slowly to handling the pollution.

"I have to believe there is pollution. You have to wonder if it's getting the scrutiny" she told The Boston Globe.

Although the Acushnet River reportedly has the highest underwater level of PCB contamination in U.S. history, the EPA took 6-1/2 years to devise a cleanup after placing the site on the Superfund list.

Nationally, non-minority communities got their EPA cleanup plans an average of 3.4 years after being put on the Superfund list, the study said.

Paul Keough, EPA's deputy regional administrator, denied that the agency drags its feet in addressing pollution in poor communities.

"I would categorically deny that there's been any conscious decision-making that would lead to quicker cleanups at some sites," Keough said.

He said a lot of the state's worst pollution cases involve midnight dumpers who operated in more rural, generally white, communities.

Cops scaring a 'pretty' student on Sunday night

Evelyn A. DE JESUS

I am so mad that I won't file any complaints against that cop, I don't have any time for that, but I am going to tell the whole campus about it. . .

On Sunday night I was visiting a friend over at Knowlton Hall. I called an escort and they told me to wait for it at Lot 43. I waited in the wrong one, in front of Worcester Dining Commons. Of course, the escort left me.

I called back to apologize and to ask them to please come over and pick me up again. I was told that I had to wait one hour because they were "overbooked" and they had waited six minutes for me already. No problem, but anyway I was very uncomfortable. I want to be clear that they did not deny me escort service, it was just bad luck.

I walked towards the Student Union and called my roommate on the yellow "Help Phone" to tell her that I was going to take the time to walk. I was definitely wrong to take that risk.

During the conversation I was telling her, in Spanish, what happened to me with the escort service. I was so upset for my situation that I used bad words in the conversation, another thing a lady should not do but, you know, the circumstances.

When I looked to the campus pond I saw these two cops walking towards me and I started to look at them while I continued to talk to my roomie.

When I looked again they were in front of me. When I got to see their faces and they saw mine in the dark, one of them told me in Spanish: "Tan linda y con esa boca." ("So pretty and with that mouth").

That is when I got really scared.

I walked one step back and he walked one forward. He was trying to have a conversation with me. I changed the topic of the conversation and told them what happened to me with the escort. They told me to call back. Then they left.

Definitely, that is not how a University policeman should approach a female student at 11:30 at night. If I take an escort it is because I am concerned about my safety. If I see a police car or a cop on campus at night I should feel that nothing will happen to me and that they won't make any obnoxious comments to me.

What is the point of telling me, "So pretty and with that mouth," at 11:30 at night? What in heaven does he want me to think after that? Does he think that now I feel happy that I have not one, but two Spanish-speaking cops in front of me? After that approach? No, thank you. Never!

All I wanted to do was to call 911 and scream: "Hey, come and pick me up, I have two sexist Spanish-speaking cops who find me pretty trying to chase me and harassing me because I speak bad words!"

If he has a little common sense he would know that is not what you say to a student, much less in that situation. Now, you can be really sure that I will never walk alone on campus again. I am glad nothing more happened because I would have told the whole campus about it also. I am not a selfish person.

I am not filing any complaint because I don't want any confidentiality at all. It is more useful to have it in the Collegian and have the Chancellor, Ms. Jo-Anne Vanin, Chief Luippold, the whole Dickinson building and the UMass community to know about a sexist Spanish-speaking, light-skinned, dark-haired, medium height cop with a mustache and light eyes who walks on campus at night and tells pretty female students not to speak bad words.

They're playing it again

David RIVERA

There are no torrid sex scenes. There's no graphic violence. There are no fancy special effects.

Just a script and a cast of the most talented Hollywood legends to ever grace the screen.

It was around seven in the evening when I left Amherst for North Africa, and let me tell you the fare was more than reasonable. Three dollars, can you believe it? I can still hardly believe it myself. Mind you it just wasn't any where in Africa — but Casablanca itself.

It all seems like a blur now but on Friday night I was 6000 miles away and 50 years in the past, enjoying champagne and caviar. You might think I'm bonkers but I'm telling the truth. I hung out with Bogie and Bergman — we're pals from way back. I think we first met when I was eight, and I've seen them every year since.

On my way through downtown Amherst I saw the marquee that simply read: "CASABLANCA." Salvation, I thought as I stepped into the Amherst Cinema. Here I was on my way to the library to (dare I say it) study, when I decided to leave for Morocco.

I wasn't alone. The theatre was filled with a scattering of people. Some were young and some were not so young. Some were alone and some were not. Most had one thing in common though: a love for a film that stands out as the all-time classic.

"I've seen this movie twenty times," claimed Amanda Collings, a UMass junior English major.

Here was a 20-year-old just bursting with excitement over a movie that was already 30 years old when she was born.

"I brought tissues for the sad scenes," she said.

Of course being the manly man that I am, I laughed at this, but I did borrow some — for my allergies of course.

Sitting there, about to watch a 50-year-old movie, I thought about the night before when I was watching the latest movie release staring Jean-Claude Van Schwarzenegger (whatever his name is), you know, the one where everyone dies except the producer and his mother-in-law.

It was supposedly rated for older children but I saw families scurrying their kids away, their hands practically crushing the poor kids' ears into their skulls in a vain attempt to keep the adult language from tainting their youth.

I left the mall with an abused, almost victimized feeling. I had paid to watch garbage; was I to blame for paying for the abuse or are the creators of the film to blame? I'm seldom wrong, so I blame them.

The Amherst Cinema is a classic entity all by itself. Just by walking in you travel back in time to the Roaring '20s. It's more than fitting then that it's showing such a great film.

From start to finish Casablanca takes you through a story that has coined more phrases than any other film.

"I stick my neck out for nobody," Bogie says, or was that George Bush?

Bogie never really said, "Play it again, Sam." He says something like it but what the heck, it's still a great moment.

Josh Zacharias, 9, came with his parents and little sister. Aside from the static of the soundtrack, which reminded him of a rain storm, Josh said he liked the movie.

"After a while I didn't, even notice that it was in black and white," Josh said, "but I think I like color movies better." (The kid has a future with Ted Turner's company.)

In Cambridge, the Brattle Street Theatre holds an annual Bogie festival with Casablanca as the highlight. When Laszlo, a.k.a. Paul Henreid, leads the cafe in singing "Marseillaise," (the national anthem of France) drowning out the Gestapo officers trying to sing "Watch on the Rhine," Harvard students stand and sing right along with the patriots of "Rick's Cafe Americain." I don't know the words so I hum.

I don't know any movie today that can create that reaction. Most people who stand up in today's theaters are either not coming back or off to the bathroom.

They just don't make movies the way they used to. I know I sound like your grand-dad, but it's the truth.

Here's looking at you. . .

'Easy cash' classifieds are scamming desperate students

James J. BROWN

Cruise ships now hiring!!! Read books for cash!!! Earn big bucks!$!$!$!!!

Has anyone else seen these great employment opportunities in their favorite newspapers and magazines? If you haven't I think maybe you ought to learn to read because there's no way you could miss them if you do. They're everywhere. We're bombarded by them, especially in publications geared towards students.

You may have been curious about them, wondering if they were really scams or not. Or maybe, like me, you were wondering how they could possible be in the classifieds section of so many newspapers without the Better Business Bureau or some other consumer watchdog group shutting them down. They must be at least somewhat legit if they're allowed to print these advertisements and no one has filed suit against them. Right? Come on, I bet you've wondered the same thing, even if you don't want to admit it.

Thought I'm ashamed to admit it, I recently gave in to curiosity and found out more about these too-good-to-be-true offers — the hard way of course. The most important thing I learned is that they are all a bunch of bullshit. How do I know for sure? Well, believe it or not I fell for the gimmick and actually sent away for some of this stuff. You would be amazed how many other people have too, and I'm sure all of us did it for the same reason. At least I know why I did it. The one weakness I had which made me give place my hopes (and money) in something I normally would have distrusted was neither stupidity nor gullibility. Even more simple than that, I was desperate.

Worse than that, I know I am not alone. There is a larger issue involved here. Our country is in seriously bad shape right now. Things will get better, I hope, but not for a while. Until then we all have to make sacrifices. A huge amount of people in the American workforce are being restructured right out of the job or just systematically done away with completely. Fine, but where does that leave us students, most of us young adults? Simple again: jobless.

I blame the situation on 12 years of Reaganomics, a stagnant, self-serving privileged class, and soon to be ex-President Bush giving the veto power he wields a bad name. There are those who will disagree with me on this, the cause, but I am sure we all agree on the effect. Students are in a terrifying predicament right now. We are forced to do anything we can to survive in a disastrous economy. Most of us had nothing to do with the bringing about of this bleak state of affairs (how many of us have been old enough to vote for more than a few years, if that?) but now we have to live with it. Some of us have been forced to take drastic measures.

The outfits that run these scam offers are nothing but the worst kind of slime. They offer to help, but all they want is to take your money. This should be easy enough to figure out, but when you're desperate you'll do desperate things. These scams know the position we're stuck in. Why do you think they advertise so often in student newspapers? Not everyone will be graduating soon but we all need at least a summer job. Unfortunately, in 1992 we are unlikely to get a decent job, or any job for that matter, until things get better economically. These scamsters know this so to them we're easy prey.

When you've tried every other option and you still come up with nothing, these offers may look halfway decent to you. You may even think, "Hey, why not? I've tried everything else." Don't do it! Here are the facts. They charge ridiculous amounts of money for information that you can get yourself just as easily. Then they reassure you into sending them money by offering you a money-back guarantee that is so restricted it becomes next to impossible to get anything back from them at all, no matter what you do.

Students are the most likely to fall for this scam operation, and the least able to afford the money they rip off from you. They will not get you a job or a chance to "earn extra money in your spare time." Take it from me. I am among the many unfortunates who found out the hard way.

I hope the scams go bankrupt someday and stop terrorizing us, but I know they never will — not with so many unsuspecting (or should I say, suspecting) victims willing to reluctantly go along with their offers when they feel they've exhausted every other possibility.

As for me, I'll find a job when school's out, eventually. Maybe I can run an ad offering the "career opportunity of a lifetime." I'll just tell people to send a cash or credit payment of $39.95 for my new informational packet, guaranteed to get them a job. Then I'll send these customers a copy of the Help Wanted section of the Sunday paper and tell them they can only get their money back if they mail me personally signed letters of rejection from the CEOs of at least 20 Fortune 500 corporations. Don't laugh. It has probably already been done.

James J. Brown is a UMass student.

Send us stuff

We love to receive letters. It means you're reading the paper, you're thinking about the paper, and you care enough about what's going on to toss in your two cents.

Swell! But like everything else, there are a few rules:

Keep your letter under 50 lines — very important.

Type (and doublespace) your letter — also important.

Include your name, address and phone number — extremely, extremely important!

Anonymous letters will not be printed.

Letters may be edited for grammar, clarity and length.

You can mail your letter to us or drop by the office at 113 Campus Center — we're in the basement.

Go on.

Make us happy, and impress your friends.

Arts & Living

Heartfelt Blood & Stones is powerful

By ERICA C. PLOUFFE
Collegian Correspondent

Blood & Stones, written and performed by Deborah Lubar, is a play compiled of different stories based upon the lives of Israeli and Palestinian women. This heartfelt and humorous drama ran from September 10 through the 12th at the Hallie Flanagan Studio Theatre at Smith College.

Lubar, an associate professor of theatre at Smith, traveled to Israel and interviewed Israeli and Palestinian women in order to learn more about the impending conflict between Jews and Arabs.

Lubar described to the audience through the portrayals of her six extremely well-developed characters the confusion, prejudices, aspirations and opinions they felt concerning this intrinsic and powerful conflict.

The play centers itself around three Jewish women telling the stories of their lives and the personal challenges of the Jewish and Arabian conflict that they are still trying to overcome. Although all characters, both Israeli and Palestinian, were played by Lubar, it seemed as though the stage were full of highly animated and talented actresses waiting for their story to be told.

The Palestinian womens' histories were very powerful, but not enough time was spent on their stories to fully comprehend the many plights that these women and their people have suffered. Nevertheless, Lubar gives a voice to the Palestinian women whose culture normally does not allow them to speak their thoughts and opinions as freely as they should.

Lubar explains, "My Jewishness allowed Jewish women to open their personal stories more fully to than the Palestinians who, understandably, told them with a more political edge. And even when I was with Palestinian women long enough for us to relax with one another, I still had to converse with most of them through translators, all of whom were young Arab men."

The play begins in a kitchen where Bruria, an older Jewish woman, reminisces about her childhood and the sacrifices she made for her country and religion. Lubar then takes the audience to an an Arabian woman whose son has been taken as a prisoner in a war camp. She is alone, with neither husband nor son to protect her from the soldiers that terrorize her and ransack her home during the night.

We are also introduced to Nuha, whose husband left her and their little girl. Nuha explains to the audience that she tries to teach her little girl what it means not to be free, so one day she will appreciate liberation.

As we return to Bruria's home, her comical and good-natured friend Rosie arrives. It seems that Rosie's sense of humor hides the painful sides of the stories she tells. Also introduced is Rosie's cousin Alla. Alla is a very timid and and unstable Jewish woman just arriving from Russia to the West Bank, the setting of the play.

This play is beautifully written, directed and executed. Last Spring, Lubar toured Blood & Stones with the director, Marianne Lust, to theatres and universities in the northeast and midwest. Lubar and Lust have also worked together in Life and Fate, a play about the Holocaust written by Frank Wiseman. Lubar has shed a new light on the Arabian and Jewish contention.

She helps give a better understanding of the ongoing conflict's history and problems, given through the eyes and voices of six very diverse women whose opinions would not be heard in their own country.

LIFE IMITATES ART — Judy Davis, Woody Allen and Mia Farrow star in director Woody Allen's latest film, Husbands and Wives. The movie eerily mirrors Allen's real-life troubles as Allen's character falls for a young college student (Juliette Lewis) and his marriage to his wife (Farrow) falls apart. The TRI-STAR release also stars Sydney Pollack, Blythe Danner, Liam Neeson and Lysette Anthony.

Not your ordinary 'toons

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

Have you ever wondered who the artistic wizards are behind the illustrations of your favorite cartoons, childhood storybooks, magazines, or even textbooks? I admit that until very recently I never considered the serious nature and artistic value of this type of illustration. In fact, my idea of this genre was of a large room containing an assembly line of smiling illustrators, some watercolors and maybe a few Crayolas.

A trip to The Northampton Center for the Arts to view the Eighth Annual Illustrators Exhibition quickly cured me of my ignorance regarding this art form.

The exhibit, sponsored by The Western Massachusetts Illustrators Guild runs until October 4th and displays various works by some of the 30 nationally known illustrators who belong to the guild.

Water colors, paper sculptures, oils, fabric and thread work, and even silk batik can be viewed at the exhibit, and subjects range from cartoon characters to personal works. Pieces such as magazine and newspaper illustrations, political cartoons, advertisements, game boards and even a quilt range from sarcastic to serene to just silly.

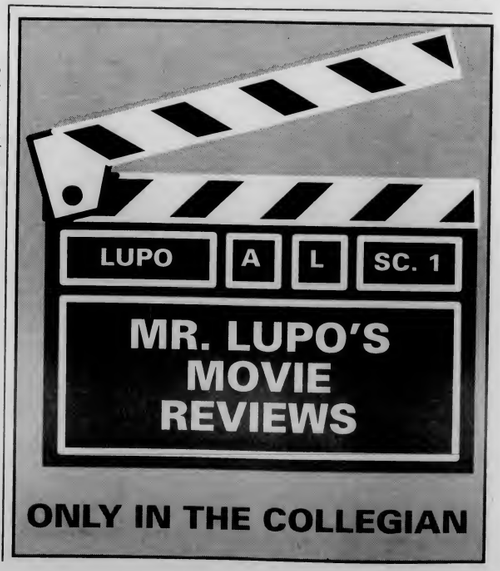
The images of some of our favorite childhood stories, such as Jack in the Beanstalk and Little Duck's Bicycle Ride, as well as cartoon favorites like "The Little Mermaid" and "The Flinstones" grace the walls. These pieces not only allow us to relive a bit of childhood, but in this light stand up individually as clever, delicate, humorous, valid artistic efforts.

The Western Massachusetts Illustrators Guild existed as the offshoot of the area chapter of the National Society of Children's Book Writers in the 1970s and was reorganized in 1982 by Tom Leamon of Amherst and Ruth Sanderson of Ware.

Leamon explains that the guild, which sponsors meetings once a month in alternating homes, offers members alliance, advice, exposure to agents, market sharing and support. A producer of political cartoons, textbook illustrations, and visual aids such as slides and film strips, Leamon asserts that the isolated and individualistic nature of illustrating can be lonely and frustrating, and that the guild serves as a support system to members.

An illustrator since 1949 and Rhode Island School of Design graduate, Leamon praises the unique ability of the illustrators to create scenes which could never be photographed, which are fueled by the imagination and which cannot be equaled by even the most advanced computer graphics.

So, for those of you who like to doodle, thumb through old storybooks, or simply get gratification from really neat illustrations, stop by The Northampton Center for the Arts. The exhibit will be a worthwhile escape from the sometimes overbearing nature of the beginning of the semester, and may even shed some light on this genre as a serious art form as well.



Union Program Council to hold first meeting

By TONY WESTCOTT
Collegian Staff

At 6 p.m. this evening in Campus Center Room 917, the Union Program Council (UPC) will hold its first General Committee Meeting for any students interested in becoming involved in a student organization that provides UMass with new and exciting musical entertainment.

UPC is a Registered Student Organization (RSO) which was founded by UMass students 16 years ago. It has hosted concerts on the UMass campus by REM, U2, Talking Heads and INXS, well before they became national stars.

Even more impressive, every concert UPC held during the last academic year proved a success. Last year's concerts by Dinosaur Jr., 3rd Bass, Shabba Ranks, Jello Biafra, Cordelia's Dad, Superchunk and Pearl Jam garnered both acclaim by students and impressive turnouts, culminating in the grand '92 Spring Concert (always free to all UMass students), which featured Rippopotamus, the Mighty Mighty Bosstones, fIREHOSE, Phish, the Beastie Boys and Fishbone.

An average UPC concert is a major undertaking that requires many dependable student members so that shows may run smoothly. Whether you're a casual music fan who'd like to work occasionally as security for a show, earning a free T-shirt and catching a free concert or would like to become more involved, UPC is, as Talent Coordinator Brad Palkevich says, "the best way on campus to get your foot in the door of the music industry."

Former UPC members have even gone on to careers at Metropolitan Entertainment and record companies such as Polygram.

Because UPC takes into consideration student feedback (through surveys conducted both at General Committee Meetings and the events themselves) and must carefully organize and coordinate every detail in producing a show from contacting agents to lighting, the many diversified posts within UPC are filled by serious, hard-working students who all started by taking that first step by attending a UPC General Committee Meeting and getting involved.

COURTESY RANDY HUGHES

MIGHTY MIGHTY GOOD MUSIC — If you join UPC, you too could work security, get a free shirt and catch a free show, like the Mighty Mighty Bosstones, who performed at the most recent Spring Concert.

Wandering wildlife aborts flight

WORCESTER, Mass. (AP) — The crew of a USAir DC-9 aborted a takeoff from Worcester Airport Monday, blowing four of the plane's tires and forcing the evacuation of 67 passengers, an airport official said.

No injuries were reported in the 7:00 a.m. incident.

"The captain decided to abort takeoff when the pilot saw some sort of wildlife crossing the runway," said Deborah Ledwell, Worcester Airport director.

"He blew the tires when he applied the brakes to abort takeoff."

Flight 234 was about to takeoff on a flight to Philadelphia, Ledwell said. She said the passengers were safely evacuated down emergency chutes and brought back to the terminal.

Authorities were unable to say what kind of animal or animals crossed the runway. Ledwell said there was one report that it was a deer, another that it was a coyote.

The Federal Aviation Administration is investigating the incident.

EPCOT gunman commits suicide

LAKEBUENA VISTA, Fla. (AP) — The former boyfriend of a Walt Disney World employee fired a shotgun at guards and briefly took two hostages before he killed himself inside Epcot Center.

Allen J. Ferris, 37, confronted a guard at the park after closing Saturday night and demanded to see his former girlfriend, but he was refused, Orange County sheriff's spokesman Jim Solomons said Sunday.

Two other guards confronted Ferris, who pulled a shotgun from a tote bag and fired three times at the first guard, who fled unharmed. The two other guards also ran, but they stopped when Ferris fired again and were taken hostage for about 10 minutes in a restroom, Solomons said.

Sheriff's deputies surrounded the area and Ferris released the guards. He later emerged and yelled: "Shoot me! Shoot me! You're going to have to kill me!" Solomons said. Moments later, Ferris held the shotgun to his head and fired.

WORK SMARTER. NOT HARDER.

We're working smarter, too. So you don't have to work harder.

For us, it means an ongoing relationship with educators and professors, striving to understand what's needed to help them make math concepts come alive.

It means continually working with students like you, discovering firsthand what you expect from the calculator you select.

The result? Calculators that are highly recommended by your teachers and peers. Calculators that are perfectly matched to your major and your coursework.

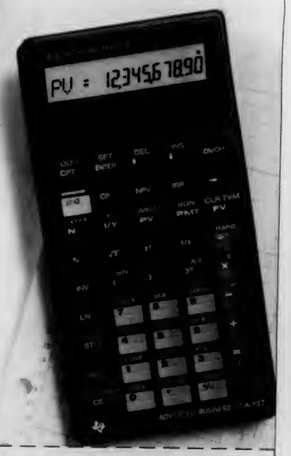
The TI-81 is a perfect example. It offers the most comprehensive, easy-to-use graphing features available with extensive programming capabilities.

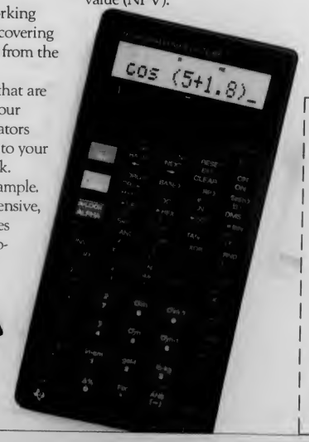
And there are others.

Like the TI-68, an advanced scientific that solves up to five simultaneous equations, performs complex numbers and offers formula programming.

The TI-36X SOLAR, a general purpose workhorse powered by ANYLITE™ solar cells so you never need batteries.

The BA II PLUS.™ For business students, this is the one to get. It handles time-value-of-money and offers cash flow analysis for internal rate of return (IRR) and net present value (NPV).





Plus a whole lot more.

No matter what your major, no matter what the course, there's a TI scientific or business calculator that's right for you. Do the smart thing: make one of them a part of your professional personality now, and for the years to come.

You'll be on your way to working smarter. Instead of harder.

Try the entire line of TI scientific and business calculators at your local TI retailer.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Someone may be trying to use your talents for free. Authors and songwriters hear the sweet ring of the cash register. A close relationship could undergo an abrupt change.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Mingle with the crowd at a business luncheon. You could make an important contact or pick up helpful information. Refuse to compete if someone changes the rules after the game begins.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A wonderful time to pursue a dream or write your own love story. Your arguments are highly compelling, drawing both strangers and close ties into your corner.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): A partner or friend surprises you with a thoughtful gift or clever business suggestion. You will be riding the crest of popularity tonight. Others admire your enthusiastic approach to life.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): A good day to refine your plans. Household designs take shape, romance has a new look, and events at a distance arouse your curiosity. Someone who is in the spotlight admires you.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Something wonderful will happen today, though I'm not quite sure what. I guess you'll just have to wait and see instead of jumping the gun and reading this.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Be ready to make changes in your daily schedule. A new, more exciting, project is coming your way. Co-workers will be especially friendly and have a lot to say.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Widen your horizons. Making a long-distance phone call will start a new chapter in your life. Travel or a chance to reach a larger segment of the public is at hand.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): It is vital that an alliance be handled in the most diplomatic way possible. You want to consolidate recent gains, not shake the foundations of your future financial security.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Guard against forcing issues on the job. Good things come to those who patiently perform their duty. Romance inspires you to try new things. Distant horizons beckon.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Be on guard if you enter unexplored territory or an unusual relationship. You will be best off among close friends this evening. An emotional relationship deepens if you say the right words.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Bar the door to ideas and people you instinctively distrust. Instead, focus on home, family and what you know best. An older person offers good advice.

stop drug lords than Michael press a button to show the scant highlights that the show possesses.

What sane man actually believes that the buttons Michael presses call up the game action he describes. It's pitiful how Michael will show only two or three plays from each game and call it coverage.

The saddest thing about the Sports Machine is how it seems that the middle ten minutes are always dedicated to auto-racing. I know auto-racing might be popular in some places (like Indianapolis, Dayton, and Nashville) but if I have to sit through one more Richard Petty highlight film, I'll be able to write the mans' biography myself.

As for Michael, the man is so annoying. He looks like he is perpetually constipated. He always has to add things after the show's features like he's actually important in the featured athlete's life.

A new show debuted last night on Channel 40. I already forget the name (that's how good it is), but it is pretty horrible. The hosts of the show acted as though Bob Zupcic should win a Gold Glove for an okay catch over the three feet bullpen wall in Fenway.

Besides that travesty, the hosts promised to bring us Indian highlights in forthcoming shows. Not Cleveland Indian highlights, but Springfield Indian highlights. Who the hell cares about a minor league hockey team in Springfield?

If I wanted to see minor league hockey I would rent a double feature of "Slapshot" and the Rob Lowe classic "Youngblood," not turn on the TV to watch the news.

Back to the Sports Machine for the final thoughts. Michael has his show syndicated all over the U.S. and despite this making many people sick, it does have at least one good point.

What is that good point? Well, it shows me that if a loser, and I do mean loser, like Michael can make it big in the U.S. peddling trash, and I do mean trash, like the Sports Machine, then there is a place in the sports world for someone like me. Thanks for that Michael, but for everything else, no thanks. I have four letters for anyone reading this: ESPN. End of story.

Goldsmith gets fifth in Nationals

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Senior Dan Goldsmith surprised a lot of people at the National Collegiate Cycling Championships in Chicago this weekend, pulling an upset by placing fifth in the kilo time trial.

"I rode the ride of my life," Goldsmith said. "People looked up when I finished and said, `where the hell have you been?'"

Goldsmith's fifth place time of 1:09:8 minutes in the 1 kilometer time trial was just inches away from first place winner Dirk Kopeland's time of 1:09.01. Still, Goldsmith had good reason to be proud of his finish.

Goldsmith trained without a coach or on a professional team in past years, racing with the UMass cycling team. He spent the last two weeks of summer at Chicago prepping for the Championships, and he said he thought it paid off.

"I dedicated my whole summer for this," he said. Goldsmith was fatigued by his stirring performance Friday and failed to qualify for the 200M match sprints. He said that the performance alone in the kilo was worth everything however.

The 1 kilometer time trial, or "kilo" as it is known to racing insiders, begins with 45 competitors, and cyclists are eliminated on the basis of their times. Goldsmith was alive after the preliminaries, and while his preliminary time was in the top 10, it was still a huge upset to finish fifth.

"I placed better than some former national champs, and there were two racers who competed in the Olympics this summer," he said. "Looking back, I think I performed well above anyone's expectations."

The big question facing the senior Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration major is what to do after graduation. Many elite cyclists hire coaches or join teams to help them train all year round for Championship meets, including the Olympics.

"Without a degree, I can't guarantee myself the type of lifestyle that I would like to lead, Goldsmith said. "School has always been the most important thing for me."

Still, with four years of training, could Goldsmith be a contender for the U.S. team that will represent the country in Atlanta?

"I don't really know," said Goldsmith. "It's difficult to say four years down the road. I do know I can produce good times, even without a coach. What I learned this weekend was that I can compete with the elite cyclists in the country."

Water polo thrashes competition at Army

COURTESY RUSS YARWORTH

Co-captain Dan McOsker and the UMass water polo team dominated play at the Army Invitational this weekend, winning all four games in the tourney.

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

If preliminary indications are correct, the University of Massachusetts water polo team could be on to something.

Coach Russ Yarworth took his troops to the Army Invitational tournament with a new offense and the preseason optimism that Yarworth has always maintained, and the team has adopted.

The offense and defense passed its first test and the optimism seemed to hold its foundation as the Minutemen went 4-0 during Sunday's tournament, taking the championship for the second time in three years.

"The biggest reason I'm pleased," said Yarworth, "is that we really didn't play as well as we could, but we still controlled most of the games we were in. We obviously played well, but I can see so much room for improvement.

"For the first tournament to come out like that really makes me look forward to the rest of the season."

It was put up or shut up in the first game as UMass played archrival Iona, and made relatively easy work of the Gaels, winning 13-8.

Tsan Engin led the Minutemen with five goals in the opener while Javier Gonzalez scored four goals, and Jeremy Alters, Jay Peluso, co-captain Dan McOsker and freshman Fransisco Marini added one each.

The goaltending tandem of Todd Hourihan and Alex Mujica combined for seven saves.

Game two was a 20-8 whitewash of the Army "B" team. Engin took a rest while 10 different players scored. Alters and Gonzalez tossed in four each while Adolpho Oliete had three and Mariani had two. Also contributing to the cause were Peluso, McOsker, Rich Schragger, John Luviano, Bobby Craver, and Dan McAuliffe, all of whom added one each.

Game three against Brown saw the Minutemen jump out to an 8-4 lead after three periods, and they held on in a hectic fourth quarter for a 9-7 win over the Bears.

Yarworth felt the referees were trying to make the game more interesting than it was, calling numerous penalties on the UMass squad.

"We couldn't play offense," Yarworth said, "and we were getting kicked out left and right on defense. When you're up four goals you're either going to be getting a lot of kickouts or very few. I don't think it was a function of how we were playing. It was more a function of the referees."

Engin was the big gun again as he had three scores. Speedster Scott Reed and Mariani had two each, and Oliete and Gonzalez had one each.

Mujica thwarted the Brown offense with 11 saves.

The Minutemen allowed Brown a risky nine man-up situations, but the Bears connected on only three of them, a statistic that Brown will surely improve on in the coming weeks.

The title was achieved with an 11-7 win over host Army. The Minutemen jumped out to a 7-3 halftime lead and never looked back.

Alters and Gonzalez scored three each, Engin and Mariani scored two each, and Reed tallied one. Mujica stopped eight shots.

With the team seeming to click on all offensive cylinders for most of the weekend, Yarworth said the team "is very excited about playing defense, which hasn't really happened before.

"The biggest surprise of the weekend was the way Francisco Mariani stepped in. He's a prime-time player."

GAME NOTES — Yarworth will remind his players that they beat Brown last year at Army, then proceeded to lose to the Bears four straight times during the season. "We don't want to be really psyched up about it," he said. "There is still room for improvement."

Women's cross country win meet at Dartmouth

By JASON NASH
Collegian Correspondent

Despite starting their season two weeks later than their competitors, the University of Massachusetts women's cross country team swept five other colleges at the Bernie Mclaine Memorial Invitatonal in Dartmouth, New Hampshire to kick off their season.

Due to some enormous budget cuts in the sports department the returning A-10 champs were disallowed any preseason practice. Amazingly enough, the Minutewomen dominated Saturday's meet even though they had only started practicing five days beforehand.

Junior Kelly Liljeblad led the way for UMass, finishing first in the 3.2 mile run. Moreover, senior tri-captains Maureen Meldrim (third), Tricia Mathiesen (fifth) and Becky Johnson (seventh) all threw in potent performances. Junior Kim Liljeblad finished ninth, helping Massachusetts place five of the top nine runners in a day that was anything but ordinary.

"The race was much closer than it should have been," said coach Julie Lafreniere. "The course was marked very poorly and at the 2.5 mile mark Kelly was forced to stop the lead she had carried and wait for the other runners because she was unsure of which way she was supposed to go."

A minute later UMass runner Becky Johnson, who was also confused, led a pack of UMass runners down the wrong path at the same 2.5 mile point, losing their team's commanding lead.

"I'm extremely happy with our performance, especially considering that we started practice so late," a jubilant Lafreniere said.

In overall scoring UMass finished with 24 points, Darmouth was second with 33, Boston University and UNH tied for third with 101, Colgate finished fourth with 141 and Keene State did not place.

Confidently Lafreniere added, "As long as everyone stays heathly and we get a little luck we should have one of the best teams in New England."

Boston College, who was ranked 18th in the country this year, will face UMass at home this Saturday.

Unbeaten Minutemen set to host Holy Cross

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

Today at Garber Field (3:30 p.m.) there will be a battle between two soccer teams going in opposite directions, extremely opposite.

The University of Massachusetts Minutemen enter today's game against the Holy Cross Crusaders with a season opening three-game win streak. The Crusaders, meanwhile, are riding a season opening three-game losing streak.

Last year when the Minutemen met the Crusaders, UMass squeaked out a 1-0 victory at Holy Cross.

The Crusaders opened up the season with a 3-0 loss to the University of Vermont. A 2-1 defeat against Marist followed for Holy Cross and in their latest outing, the Crusaders fell to Fordham 1-0.

The lone Holy Cross goal this season was scored by junior sweeper Brian Nigri. While the Crusader offense has sputtered, or make that fizzled, this year, their defense for the most part has been tough.

The goalie for Elvis Comries' team is junior Dave Stalter. At 6-foot-2 and 205 lbs., Stalter is a physical presence and his play has been solid in light of the Crusaders' listless attack.

The Minutemen looked very impressive in their last outing, a 6-1 shellacking of the Temple Owls. On the field, the defense controlled the play while the offense peppered Temple goalie Pat Kivlin with shots all day long.

The outing was particularly impressive when compared to last year's Temple outing, a 0-0 tie after two overtimes. Coach Sam Koch thought the team's performance was excellent but said there is always room for improvement.

"We are very pleased with the [play] finishing, the ball movement is excellent," he said. "There's still always things to work on but that's why we have the whole season.

"I think we'll be ready for Holy Cross, we have got to get over this win and settle down, but I think we'll be ready."

Junior midfielder Justin Edelman, who scored against Temple, was pleased with how the team played but also thought about avoiding a letdown against Holy Cross.

"This [Temple victory] is probably the biggest win in my three years here," Edelman said. "We'll savor it for awhile, but we have to be ready for Holy Cross on Tuesday."

Columnist offers thoughts on U.S. Open

Pete Sampras Sunday was looking at an early U.S. Open final Christmas gift. At one set all and serving for the third set at 5-4, Sampras double-faulted his way into a third set tie-break where Stephan Edberg once again offered another treat.

Edberg returned the faulting favor serving 5-3 in the breaker losing the mini-advantage to give Sampras two serves at 4-5. But once again Pete returned the present with a double reply, all but sealing Sampras' fate.

David
RIVERA

"My serve really let me down," Sampras would later understate.

Edberg won the third set tie-break and went on to trounce a sluggish Sampras in the forth, giving Edberg his second U.S. Open in as many years.

The ladies' final was routine, for Monica Seles that is. With a commanding 6-3, 6-3 victory over Arantxa Sanchez Vicario, Seles captured her first U.S. Open singles title and her seventh Grand slam title, all before her 19th birthday.

With the nets taken down and the popcorn swept away a U.S. Open wrap-up wouldn't be the same without mentioning the aging legends that truly make the tournament great.

Jimmy Connors celebrated his 40th birthday and 22nd U.S. Open. After a first round victory, Connors would lose to Ivan Lendl in four sets, ending his attempt at reaching the semifinals as he did last year.

In this day of Diva tennis stars, it's more than a thrill to see a player give his all. Bravo Jimmy, bravo. We better see you next year.

Being a hard-core Martina Navratilova fan I'm finding it harder and harder to cheer her on. This was her 20th U.S. Open. She ended up loosing to one of the Meleeva sisters, (which one I forget their about 12 on the tour) which was to say the least a choke.

Following her loss, Martina claimed that her "nerves" got to her in the end. When I hear her say stuff like that it really strings my racket. After 20 Opens she's still getting nervous? Flake city.

If I sound a tad cynical my apologies, but once again yours truly could find a ticket for the final week for under $200. Granted I'm merely a weekend hacker but I'm a yank and I feel that being a tennis fan that I should have an opportunity to buy a ticket to my own national tournament without having to take out a loan.

So, until next time, hit that ball out in front and remember, when in doubt call it out.

David Rivera is a Collegian columnist.

Jeff on George: Sports Machine gives hope to all

My topic for this week might be more appropriate for the editorial page, but I'll leave that for Morrissey. Instead, I'll moan about the "cable" we have on campus in our rooms right here in the sports page. Anyways, I'm only moaning about the sports coverage we get in our rooms and not anything else.

Jeff
CROFTS

The biggest all-sports show we can see in our rooms is on just one night (Sunday) and is the ridiculous and sad George Michael's Sports Machine.

The Sports Machine, naturally hosted by George Michael, is perhaps the biggest pile of [expletive] on TV since the A-Team. On second thought, I'd much rather watch B.A. Baracus and company

Teen-agers held for murder in Springfield case

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Two teen-agers have been ordered held on murder and a 21-year-old university student has been arrested on conspiracy in the shooting of a 16-year-old Springfield boy, authorities said.

Hampden County District Attorney William Bennett said Arnaldo Esteras was gunned down Sunday night on Main Street after he made a derogatory comment about the black and gold beads worn by a member of the Latin Kings gang.

Bennett said Esteras was allegedly ordered killed after the remark was repeated to other gang members.

Charged with the boy's murder were Ismael Cintron, 17, of Springfield and a 16-year-old, who was not identified because of his age. Cintron pleaded innocent at his arraignment Monday in Springfield District Court and was ordered held without bail.

Police said Alex Delgado, 21, of New Haven, Conn., was arrested Monday night at a residence hall at the University of Massachusetts. He was held pending arraignment on a charge of conspiracy to commit murder in Esteras' shooting, according to Bennett.

The district attorney said police were seeking several other people in connection with the killing.

Calling it "an execution" Bennett said when Esteras went down at the corner, the gunman walked up to the boy and fired four to five shots into his head at point blank range.

Both Bennett and Police Chief Ernest Stelzer appealed for calm in the neighborhood as Esteras' young friends collected funds to help his family pay for the funeral.

"Retaliation would be the worst possible thing," Bennett said. "Some arrests have been made. Warrants for the arrest of others have been issued. We know who these people are."

Stelzer said police had put on extra patrols in the area and pleaded with residents to "give us a chance."

Esteras' nickname, "Nardy," was spray-painted on the sidewalk where he fell and red roses were stuck in the links of a nearby chain-link fence. In a peaceful tribute scores of neighbors and friends gathered at the scene Monday night to pray and light candles.

Clinton's war record defended

By JOHN DIAMOND
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sen. John Kerry led a contigent of congressional war veterans Tuesday in a coordinated defense of Bill Clinton's actions during the Vietnam War.

As a predicted showdown between President Bush and Clinton on the draft issue fizzled in Salt Lake City, a dozen House and Senate Democrats took to the Capitol lawn to defend Clinton. The lawmakers, all war veterans themselves, said Clinton's avoidance of military service during the Vietnam War and his subsequent explanations of his actions should not be an issue in the presidential campaign.

Although Bush wound up barely mentioning Clinton's war record in a speech to the National Guard Association in Utah, the Democrats accused the Republicans of turning the draft issue into the "Willie Horton of 1992."

"We're here to make certain that we shift to the real issues of the day," said Kerry, D-Mass. Kerry, a decorated Vietnam veteran, said that Bush was "breaching the bond" that exists among veterans, "to use it for personal, partisan advantage."

Clinton campaign operatives who helped arrange the event said it was "serendipity" that it coincided with the appearances by Bush and later Clinton Tuesday at Salt Lake City. Clinton said nothing about his draft record in the speech but spoke of the duties and obligations of the president as commander-in-chief.

Atkins concedes defeat in Democratic primary

By DANIEL BERGEN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Democrat Chester Atkins, a four-term congressman tangled up in anti-incumbent sentiment and new district lines, conceded defeat with only early results in from Tuesday's primary.

"I hope I've made a difference," Atkins told supporters at his campaign headquarters in Boxboro, less than two hours after the polls closed. "Let me say to the voters of the 5th District, 'Thank you for letting me serve.' It's been a great experience."

With 5 of 196 precincts, or 3 percent reporting, former Middlesex County Assistant Prosecutor Martin Meehan had 676 votes, or 58 percent, to Atkins' 490 votes, or 42 percent.

"To Mr. Meehan, I say congratulations and I'll be voting Democratic in November," Atkins said. "I leave the public stage with no regrets."

In the Republican primary in the same district, former Congressman Paul Cronin took an early lead over Michael Conway of Lowell.

Atkins, 44, of Concord, had known he was in for a tough time. He had come under attack for writing the second-largest number of bad checks in the Massachusetts delegation, with 126 overdrafts.

The former state legislator and former state Democratic Party Chairman ran self-deprecating radio advertisements in the last weeks of the campaign, calling his banking troubles a mistake and acknowledging that he was not perfect.

Other primary returns showed Rep. Joseph Early of Worcester, damaged by the House check scandal, and Rep. Nicholas Mavroules of Peabody, indicted on 17 federal changes ranging from racketeering to tax evasion leading their rivals.

But Rep. Gerry Studds of Cohasset was in a tight race with Paul Harold, whose home town is the district's biggest city, Quincy.

Two other Democrats considered shoe-ins for re-nomination, Reps. Richard Neal of Springfield, and Joseph Kennedy of Boston, maintained commanding leads over their rivals.

Corporations give a hoot
Encourage purchase of recycled goods

By JONATHAN YENKIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — More than 20 companies, including McDonald's Corp., Coca-Cola Co. and Sears, Roebuck and Co., launched a national campaign Tuesday to encourage U.S. businesses to buy recycled goods.

The goal is to fill an important piece of the recycling equation, which has produced vast supplies of paper, glass and other reusable trash but not enough demand.

"America works best when supply and demand has been in force," said Phil Bailey, coordinator of the business alliance for the National Recycling Coalition, which is holding a conference in Boston this week.

"This will help pull material through the recycling loop rather than push it through," he said.

Steve Morrow, recycling manager for Coca-Cola, said the group hoped to recruit 5,000 small and large businesses to commit themselves to by recycled products.

"This is the first time that such a diverse group of American corporations have come together to create a market for recyclables," Morrow said.

The alliance will conduct programs around the country to show businesses how they can buy recycled goods and use them in their daily operations. Part of this effort will include a database that informs businesses where, for example, they might buy memo pads made of recycled paper.

As a first step, the member companies surveyed their own organizations and found $2.7 billion worth of materials they use, either for internal purposes — such as office supplies — or to make their products, contain recycled goods.

Sears, for instance, has asked its purchasing agents to buy business supplies that use recycled content. Also, the retail giant has set goals with its suppliers to use corrugated paper and plastic packaging that contain at least 25 percent recycled materials.

"The response has been excellent," said Keith Tice, national director of packaging and labeling for Sears. "No one has turned us down. Some have agreed to higher numbers."

The survey of alliance members also found other examples:

• Cracker Barrel restaurants not only uses recycled paper in its menus, but also uses recycled construction materials for its buildings.

• American Airlines uses recycled paper for its napkins and tissue.

• Bank of America uses recycled paper for automated teller receipts.

Among the other members of the alliance are 3M Co., Anheuser-Busch Cos. Inc., DuPont Co., United Parcel Service, James River Corp. and Safeway Inc.

The careful preparation that went into the Capitol lawn event was evident when Kerry noted that he had carefully read all the statements by Clinton on his draft record and found them to be consistent. Republicans and some press reports have suggested that Clinton changed hisstory on the Vietnam draft, or withheld key information until forced to acknowledge it.

"He himself has said that he hasn't done the best job of making clear the sequence of events," Kerry said.

"I understand what happened and I think the American people do," Kerry said. "He has directly and openly said he was opposed to the war, no mystery there. . . He has said he used his deferments for a time as every other American did, no mystery there."

Local News

Balanced Ticket

Michigan State University will be cast into the national spotlight on Sept. 22, as the campus hosts a debate between Pres. Bush and Democratic nominee Bill Clinton. Despite excitement for the event, The State News, MSU's undergraduate newspaper, has raised concern about student's role in the debate. Namely whether they will have any role at all.

In a Sept. 2 editorial, The State News asked both the debate organizers and the University to utilize student volunteers but predicted students were "likely to receive the shaft."

One point of concern is the possibility of as few as 100 tickets in the 3,500 seat Wharton Center Great Hall will be allocated to Michigan State students.

Truth In Advertising

On August 27, the Arizona Daily Wildcat, the undergraduate newspaper for the University of Arizona, ran an advertisement for a local entertainment establishment named the Green Dolphin.

The Green Dolphin, which calls itself "An Arizona Tradition," boasts of a special for Thursday night which includes 25-cent drafts and "no cover for the beautiful Wildcat women."

On the weekends though, it gets a little tougher to get in free. However, University of Arizona women should not fear — The Green Dolphin obviously realizes university women need to save every penny and does implement a "no cover with mini skirt" deal.

In the Daily Kent Stater, the student newspaper of Kent State University, a Cheer's Bar and Grill advertisment states Saturday is "Ladies night," which means "ladies drink for 50 cents all night." The following night really heats up at Cheer's with a "Ladies Wet T-Shirt and Guys Best Buns Contests"

I would imagine the chance of either of these establishments franchising itself to the Happy Valley would be unlikely.

A Case of Mistaken Identity

Michigan State University senior psychology major Bill Lupo has a big financial problem. It seems Lupo owes $455 in overdue fines to the University Library and the library wants their money.

Lupo claims his ID was stolen and the thief checked out the books in question.

"Legally and in the eyes of the MSU library I'm held responsible if the person does not return them," Lupo told The State News.

The library does not seem to care for Lupo's story.

"Anything that is checked out is the financial responsibility of the person's whose name is on the I.D." said Kriss Ostrom, head of circulation at the MSU library. Ostrum asserts that Lupo will have to pay the fine or be unable to register.

Title IX Strikes Again

Pittsburgh University is struggling to attain gender equality in its athletic department, according to The Pitt, the student newspaper of the University.

Title IX, a federal legislation signed into law in 1972, mandates that Universities provide equal opportunity for men and women to participate in collegiate athletics. Failure to comply can result in a suspension of federal funds.

The Pitt reports that the University spent $3,412,400 on men's athletics and $250,006 on women's athletics, which means that 93 percent of total spending goes to men's programs.

Despite the large discrepancy of funding and the apparent absence of gender equality, Pittsburgh Athletic Director Oval Jayes claims Pitt is not in violation of Title IX.

"Gender equality is a moral issue," Jayes told The Pitt. "What we are trying to do is be fair. The commitment that needs to be made is to make sure that we provide a quality program for all our student athletes — male and female."

Jayes went on to say comparing the money spent on men's and women's athletics is like "comparing apples to oranges." Jayes has also instructed all Pittsburgh coaches to not comment to the press on the issue.

MassPIRG seeks to tap student vote for recycling

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

As part of their most ambitious project of the year, the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group is trying to register students to vote and educate them in order to get votes in the November ballot for two recycling initiatives, according to campus organizer and MassPIRG member Sarah Turk.

"Students are such a large portion of the population. We do have the ability to make change," said Turk. "We just need to get students registered to vote."

Last semester, over 23,000 signatures were gathered in Amherst as part of a statewide effort to get the initiatives included on the November ballot. Now MassPIRG is working to get the questions passed.

"We worked hard to get [the initiatives] on the ballot, now we want to get it passed," said Turk.

MassPIRG is aiming to register 2,000 students, 500 more than the most ever registered in previous semesters. "We think we can definitely accomplish it," said Turk.

Question #3 on the November ballot will set strict recycling standards for companies reducing wasteful packaging, Turk said.

The second initiative on the ballot, question #4, is called "Polluter's Pay." This initiative forces industries to pay taxes on chemicals they are using so they can develop a fund to pay for the clean-up of toxic sites. Industries would be required to pay one-fifth of a penny for every pound of waste.

"It doesn't seem like much, but companies are using tons of chemicals so it can really add up," said Turk.

MassPIRG is a statewide environmental and consumer group with chapters at 27 campuses, including the founding chapter here at UMass.

Since 1972, a majority of students have voted to pool their resources through a $4 per student, per semester, waivable fee. Through the fee system, students are able to hire professional staff to help coordinate their efforts on public interest issues.

The rest of the semester, MassPIRG will be conducting Environmental Education, Hunger and Homelessness and Energy Efficient projects.

MassPIRG will be attempting to educate students on campus through forums and events and also working with elementary and secondary schools in the area.

MassPIRG is also encouraging students to attend a conference in Virginia about hunger and homelessness and leadership skills. They will then return and educate students about what they learned.

> "Students are such a large portion of the population. We do have the ability to make change."
> Sarah Turk
> MassPIRG

Two other projects are the homelessness and hunger project and the Energy project, which will educate students of information on alternative energy sources such as solar and wind power.

Turk said there has been no decision on which specific activities will be held. He said there is a general meeting Sept. 30 to decide what students want to do.

Turk said last semester was both busy and successful for the MassPIRG chapter. She said the most important project was the reaffirmation drive, which occurs once every three years. Through a vote, students reaffirmed their support of the waivable fee, with 80 percent voting yes.

"That was our biggest success," said Turk.

Students also worked with the Residential Recycling Program to improve on campus recycling as well as to coordinate Earth Week. The other major accomplishment of the spring semester was Hunger and Homelessness Week, which included both a food and clothing drive.

Career Center to hold job fair

Open House offers chance to explore world of work

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN
With jobs hard to come by during this recession, students line up in search of employment outside the University's Student Employment Office in Whitmore. The Mather Career Center is encouraging students not to put off looking for after-graduation jobs. Tomorrow's Open House i s one of several activities the Center has planned to assist students.

By SARAH LEVESQUE
Collegian Staff

Although the glow of summer has not yet faded for many students, it is not too early to begin looking for an after-graduation job or summer internship at the Third Annual Career Center Open House to be held tomorrow and Thursday outside of the Curry Hicks building.

Each senior who attends will receive a personalized career planning packet and meet the career counselor for their major. Assistant Director of the Mather Career Center Tina Acker noted that in the past students had to come to the center to pick up the "starter packet."

The event will also feature information on co-ops and internships for juniors and community service opportunities for first- and second- year students.

"In today's economy, it's important to get out there early on," said Acker. "We have a new crop of seniors that we want to encourage to see us now, instead of waiting."

Representatives from various firms planning to recruit here on campus this year will attend the Open House. They include Filene's, General Electric, United Technologies, Providence Hospital and John Hancock Insurance.

Acker said 60 percent of graduating seniors last year used the Career Center's services. The 1991 Student Affairs Research, Information and Systems of the University of Massachusetts Report says 64 percent of UMass students were "satisfied" with their "career counseling and placement services" and 16 percent were "very satisfied."

The Career Center Open house will run from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. on both days. "We want to let the campus know what our services are," said Acker.

Senior communications major Jenn Lewis, who has worked for the Career Center for a year and a half, urges students to acquaint themselves with the Center's resources.

"People are very personable here. Mather is very user-friendly," said Lewis. "One important aspect is we accomodate students. We want students here. We want you to get the information you need for you future."

WORK SMARTER. NOT HARDER.

Engineering student? Smart.

Math or science major? Also smart.

On tests, you probably run equations over again to make sure they're right. So you're working harder.

You don't have to do that anymore. Not when you use the TI-68 Advanced Scientific or TI-85 Graphics Calculator, with their last equation replay feature — and many other smart functions.

We've spent years with students like you and educators like your professors to develop the TI-68 and the TI-85. That's why they're so highly recommended.

For engineering students, the TI-68 solves up to five simultaneous equations, has complex number functions and offers formula programming.

The TI-85 builds on the power of the TI-68 by adding a wide range of graphing capabilities. Math students can handle calculus problems more easily. And technical students can see the functions for a better understanding of problems.

The TI-85 also handles complex numbers. Matrices. Vectors. Lists. Strings. Plus, it offers a powerful one-equation SOLVER.

Try a TI-68 or TI-85 at your local TI retailer today. And start working smarter. Instead of harder.

UM professor wins appeal in wetlands case

A University of Massachusetts professor, along with seven other wetland experts, won an appeal against a federal court decision which allowed a housing developer to build on a previously protected wetland in Illinois.

"The court withdrew its entire decision," said Joseph S. Larson, a professor of forestry and wildlife management. He said the decision, which was announced Sept. 10, was probably influenced by the brief he and the other wetland experts submitted.

Larson, the director of the University's Environmental Institute, said if the appeal wasn't successful, the earlier decision in "Hoffman Homes, Inc. v. U.S. Environmental Protection Agency," could have seriously harmed wildlife and water quality.

He said the ruling on the appeal was unusual. "We had expected that the court might rule in our favor, but would restrict the ruling to that one site in Illinois," Larson said.

Instead, the ruling on the appeal vacated the earlier decision and ordered an out-of-court settlement between the developer and the U.S. EPA.

He said the earlier court ruling assuming that isolated wetlands do not provide flood control or have an impact on water quality was simply wrong.

"A lot of so-called isolated wetlands are connected through subsurface aquifers," he said. "If the ruling had stood, a lot of wetlands could have been drained or filled, and eventually that would have caused real problems, such as flooding and a decrease in water quality."

Larson and the other petitioners said many isolated wetlands store excess rainwater during wet seasons, which helps prevent flooding and then contributes water to nearby aquifers during dry seasons.

He said many isolated wetlands also act as filters for sediments and pollutants.

Larson, chairperson of the Working Group on International Wetlands and the National Wetlands Technical Council, is also involved in trying to persuade the Bush administration to withdraw its proposed guidelines defining wetlands.

Read the fine print before you sign with the Republicans

It seems that the Republicans have forgotten to mention a few minor details during all the hoopla in Houston. They stood up at the podium like realtors in a living room, showing you the hard-wood floors and spacious rooms, but failing to mention the termites in the walls and rats in the basement.

Their platform seemed fairly direct and the speeches sounded pretty good, some even had a sense of humor, but for the most part they were like contracts that seem straightforward until you read the fine print. Before signing their lease to the White House, there are a few details that need to be cleared up.

E.C. THOMAS

Take for instance Pat Buchanan: "George Bush is on our side." When referring to "our," I'm speaking about white males, for they are the ones deserving of power. Consequently our party will represent them, and make sure they are given more power and influence over this country. As for the rest: women should stay in the kitchen, minorities in the ghettos and homosexuals in the closet where they belong.

"This election is about who we are." We are a bunch of chauvinistic, homophobic, white rich males who would rather blow up a country to save our oil resources than send aid to a country where men, women and children are being tortured and murdered.

Ronald Reagan, just as he did during the Iran-Contra hearing, forgot to mention a few things as well: "George Bush is a man of honor and integrity." When he said "no new taxes" and "I am the education and environment President," he was only kidding.

"Whether we are Afro-American, Irish, Jewish or Christian. . . we are all equal in the eyes of the Lord." Our eyes, however, will turn the other way when racist police officers are caught, on videotape, beating an Afro-American but are later found "not guilty."

"We are an empire of ideals and free men." However, "free" does not apply to homosexuals and women. Their freedom includes the following restrictions: homosexuals are not allowed the freedom to marry and women are not allowed the freedom of choice with their bodies or of fighting in combat.

This wouldn't be complete without an observation of Dan Quayle's "rise from poverty" speech: I rose from poverty, yet I was born into one of the richest families in this country.

The platform they conjured up, filled with promises and proclamations, was a little seedy as well. The administration will create jobs for American workers. But we're going to sign a free trade agreement with Mexico, worsening work conditions for those who do work and taking away the opportunity for work for those who don't.

The administration will strengthen the economy. Even though we are the ones who have gotten you into this mess, you should not trust us enough to get you out — after all, haven't we always stood by our promises?

We will strengthen the family values in this nation. This is according to our family values: men at work, women in the kitchen — any diversion from this example we will blame on sitcoms.

But the biggest detail the Republicans forgot — or just all together disregarded — was the fact that the American public is not as stupid as they, or the Japanese, think.

However, since we are the Landlords, maybe they'll re-evaluate our intelligence levels, because after reading that proposed lease over closely, I think it's about time we found some new tenants.

E.C. Thomas is a UMass student.

Community defends gay lifestyle, reprimands columnist

Editor's note: The following four letters are a few of the many letters the editorial desk has received which respond to Michael Morrissey's Monday column entitled "Gay lifestyle examined."

When Michael Morrissey quoted Morton Downey, Jr., in his mistitled column, "Gay life examined," he aptly allied himself with the loud-mouthed rabble-rousers of this world. Instead of attempting tenable arguments against homosexuality, Morrissey scrawled out a litany of shallow and patronizing quips masquerading as thought. I wholeheartedly defend the Collegian's right to publish all opinions, but such clearly ill-considered dross is a disgrace.

Morrissey decried homosexuals' "audacity" in asserting their rights, and denied any parallels between that quintessentially American action and the civil rights movement. This despite the fact that homosexuals, like people of color, have been ostracized, persecuted and lynched — in the name of family values and what's American — since the early days of this country founded on the principle of tolerance. Are hate and groundless elitism desirable American family values?

And Morrissey argued that, according to the Bible, acting on homosexual urges is immoral. The Bible holds great wisdom. But it also contains injunctions again taking out loans and eating rabbit or hot dogs. It urges men not to grow their hair long, and commands women without hats not to enter churches. Are such anachronistic precepts relevant to a wise morality?

Morrissey also quoted a Newsweek poll reporting that 53 percent of those surveyed considered homosexuality immoral. Imagine a poll taken in Germany in 1944 concerning the morality of the Jewish lifestyle. If morality rested on pollsters' findings, we'd all be lost.

Above I've mentioned Morrissey's more cogent misconceptions. Much of the rest of his article — such as his naive contention that "many lesbians dream of a 'utopia' without men" — is better left scribbled on the bathroom wall. Valuable Collegian space should be devoted to more incisive pieces from mature, articulate authors.

Timothy Lahey
Northampton

Dear Mr. Morrissey:

I am not gay nor do I pretend to fully understand or feel the suffering of the homosexual community. But I have an aunt who is a lesbian and I would do anything, sacrifice everything, in order to spare her and anyone else from the poison of your ignorance.

David R. Goodman
Amherst

Dear Mr. Morrissey:

As a heterosexual grandmother, I'd like to reply to your column. It is misnamed. Your title was, "Gay lifestyle examined," and your "exam" is one-sided. But more serious, I believe, is your condemnation of a lifestyle that is a workable and happy one for many people. I feel lesbians are my sisters. As to your worry about there not being children, if gays and lesbians prevail, that is unlikely: men and women will always be attracted to one another. More interesting is your own anal fixation. It is said that things bother one only to the extent they remain unresolved in oneself.

Anyway, if you truly believed that the "world doesn't care" what one does in the bedroom, why are you constantly emphasizing it?

M.J. Taylor
Amherst

This letter is a response to Michael Morrissey's column on homosexuality. Morrissey begins his thinly veiled attack by linking gay people with AIDS. His tactic in even mentioning the disease was to simply equate gay people with the AIDS epidemic in the minds of readers and feed the unfortunate misconception that it is a "gay disease." Once again it seems necessary to remind Mr. Morrissey, and others like him, that AIDS affects everyone, straight or gay.

After the nonsense about a lesbian utopia Mr. Morrissey then goes on to stick in a disclaimer that his column is in no way about gay bashing. If you believe that then you'll also believe that Pat Buchanan will soon be announcing his support for Teddy Kennedy in 1994. It's a good tactic that has worked well for the Republicans at the national level: deny that you're attacking someone and then attack them anyway. It allows for plausible deniability later on.

The attack continues with another popular Republican tactic: dividing people. Mr. Morrissey says that gay people have never been oppressed like Black people and have no right to say that they have been. By saying this, all Mr. Morrissey is trying to do is to divide two minority groups against each other and legitimize his attack on one group by kissing up to another. It's pretty lame and I have a hard time believing that African-Americans will swallow it. To them I say: keep reading Mr. Morrissey's column and watch which side he comes down on regarding issues of importance to you. He'll show his true colors soon enough.

There are two more things I want to point out. The first corresponds to what I mentioned in the last paragraph but it's division on a larger scale. He mentions again and again that gay people are trying to "take over our country." Where do you think gay Americans come from, Mike? They aren't manufactured somewhere. They're born and raised right here in America. They're raised right alongside their straight counterparts. They attend the same churches and schools, work in the same places, and pay taxes just like everybody else. So be careful when you say they're trying to take over the country. They don't need to because they've always been a legitimate part of it anyway.

Finally, I want to instruct Mr. Morrissey on one final point. He claims to represent the "conservative ideal." Perhaps he should retrace some history of the conservative movement in this country. It stands for less government in people's lives, all facets of people's lives. This includes what they do in the bedroom. Call Governor Weld, Mr. Morrissey. Maybe he can explain this in more detail to you. Or perhaps you're not interested. Why let facts get in the way of giving a minority group a good beating? Your column was not about examining the gay lifestyle: it was an attack by a Bible-thumping, right-winger on a group of Americans who don't deserve it. Lighten up, Mr. Morrissey.

Students should read upcoming crime report

The first edition of this year's Collegian included an Associated Press wire service story on the new federal law requiring campuses to make crime information public.

In the next week or so, the UMass Division of Public Safety will have copies available of this campus's crime report available at Dickinson Hall or Whitmore at the information desk and Dean of Students Office. The report lists categories of crimes and their numbers on campus as reported to UMass police. One caution: the crime categories may be confusing. For instance, the AP story listed too many reports of rape because that crime came under the heading of forced sex, which covers incidents other than rape. (It should also be noted that all reports of rape involved acquaintances; students shouldn't believe danger is only from a stranger lurking in the shadows.)

Further information on category definitions is available upon request through public safety at Dickinson Hall or in the federal uniform crime records reports, which are available at the Library's government documents section.

While the campus is relatively safe, no place is immune from crime. Students should act accordingly and read the report. Besides statistics, the report describes services from police and other offices. For instance, there is an escort service at night and emergency telephones are located across the campus. UMass police will also address campus groups about safety upon request. Likewise, while police encourage students to report rape, students who prefer not to go to the police can still avail themselves of the medical and counseling services offered in several areas, such as Health Services and Everywoman's Center.

Because UMass is a public university, it has always made crime information available. We hope that with heightened awareness of campus crime, students and police can work together more closely to make the campus even safer.

The Rodney King verdict: No turning back

Last semester, the University of Massachusetts erupted into political turmoil following the acquittal of the four Los Angeles police officers charged with the beating of motorist Rodney King. As Los Angeles burned in the frustration and anguish of the continuing plague of racism in America, the local population found itself confronted with this stark reality head on.

Demonstrations that took place across the country in San Francisco, Atlanta and Boston also spread to Western Massachusetts. Here in Amherst, buildings were occupied at three colleges, beginning with UMass, and spreading on to Amherst and Hampshire Colleges. These acts of civil disobedience were carried out by students in the name of the continuing war against the racial injustice that so well characterizes our nation.

In all three cases, students successfully received moderate yet symbolic concessions from the administration officials to commit to hire more minority faculty and administrators at their respective campuses.

The largest and most extensive protest was by far the campaign to force radical racial reform in the policies of the paper that you are now reading, the Daily Collegian. On Friday, May 1, a large group of students marched into the Collegian offices demanding reform in the paper on its policies concerning people of color at the newspaper. Following the demonstration at the Collegian newsroom, the editors, citing a fear of the paper being shut down, moved the operations to a secret location off-campus after the students had left.

Most of the editors of color at the newspaper had criticized the Collegian during the newsroom demonstration and as a result were not informed of the the off-campus location. The Collegian editors who had the newspaper moved off-campus, however, continued to encourage the editors of color to write for the paper and asked them to please slide their articles under the door of the Collegian newsroom.

The rest was history. On the following Monday, supporters of the expelled editors of color responded by removing that day's edition of the Collegian from its distribution points around campus and disposing of them. The Collegian editors who had moved our campus press to a secret location off-campus cried censorship.

This act of civil disobedience ultimately proved to be very effective. The editors eventually restored the newspaper back to its original location on campus and agreed to negotiate before a public forum the students' demands for reform at the newspaper. However, after two days of deliberations, negotiations broke down, and supporters from the audience rushed the Collegian news office, driving out the Collegian editors. There was a lot of shouting and shoving and assault charges were filed.

The next afternoon, the Collegian conceded to all of the students demands.

There is a lesson to be learned here. Number one: power concedes nothing without a struggle. It never did and it never will. Number two: When violence talks, people listen.

Martin F.
JONES

When the people of Los Angeles rebelled against repression in their neighborhoods, our President, Mr. Bush, condemned them as thieves and thugs and vowed to "restore order" to the streets of Los Angeles. Many others decried the uprising as destructive and senseless.

I'll never forget the night when the verdict was delivered on national television. Within hours, the tempest had begun to sweep across the city and the nation. This was not the first time that police had been unjustly acquitted of beating or even murdering a person of color, but because the videotaped account of the beating was televised repeatedly, the entire nation was brought to the scene of the crime. Now, no one could deny that our nation is a fundamentally racist institution. The racial injustice against Rodney King was committed by the law, upheld by the law, and the first response from our honorable President, Mr. George Bush, was that "Justice has been served."

Looking back to last semester, I've wondered how truly sincere were the local students who demonstrated in the wake of the verdict. I've wondered if there would have been any real response here had not the city of Los Angeles erupted as it did. It seems as if many of the local liberal students who were involved were simply caught up in the sensationalism of the moment and decided to do what was most "politically correct."

Let us not forget the real issue at hand here. It is real easy for us to protest here in the "Happy Valley" because we aren't being confronted with the stark reality and consequence of the Los Angeles uprising. Entire neighborhoods have been destroyed. The city is now effectively under martial law. Hundreds of people of color were unjustly arrested and are still being held. Police continue to raid homes to seize "looted property."

In inner cities across the country people of color are living in "death camps." Yes, death camps: people are trapped there, unable to leave, and suffering from a slow and miserable death, both physically and spiritually. Young Black males are not living to see their high school education, the infant mortality rivals those of underdeveloped nations and AIDS has become a normal part of life.

It is clear that we cannot forget the lessons this past spring has taught us. We must make sure that the sacrifices that took place in L.A. and Amherst do not go in vain. Over the summer, the U.S. Congress approved a measly $500 million urban aid bill to address the problems that culminated in the L.A. uprising. Most of the money was used for summer jobs intended to keep the youth off the streets and out of trouble. Most of the jobs were never actually filled.

Over the summer, after the students had left and the political activity of the campus had subsided, the UMass administration sabotaged a grant to fund a minority program dedicated to helping students of college reach their college dreams. This program, the Upward Bound Program, is now defunct.

Are we actually returning back to the same old business as usual? Sadly enough it appears so. We shall see this semester who's in this fight for the long haul or not. We shall see if the administration of this campus holds to its promises of last semester. We shall see who holds the Collegian responsible for including people of color in the newspaper on their terms, and which people of color actually decide to take advantage of this inclusion.

Most of us students are too young to remember the the last time cities burned in America during the 1960s. However, last spring, we all watched Los Angeles burn and can still visit the city, still reeling from the aftermath. We all are old enough to see with our own eyes what is happening in America. We can decide whether not to face this reality or once again turn a blind eye to the issue. The choice is yours.

UMass Black Student Union to hold first General Assembly

By LAKEISHA CRISWELL
Collegian Correspondant

Tonight, the Malcolm X Cultural Center will be the site of the first-ever General Assembly of the newly-established UMass Black Student Union.

The Black Student Union was established last semester with the aim of improving the quality of life for Black students on campus, according to students who founded the organization.

Sophomore Fabiola Narcisse, interim president of the Black Student Union and a double major in Social Thought and Political Economy and English, says the organization will be crucial to the future of the Black community at UMass.

"The Black Student Union is essential toward providing a unified voice for Black students at the university," says Narcisse. "With enough support and participation, the Black Student Union can hold unlimited potential for positive change in our community."

Last spring, Narcisse was chosen to serve as interim president during the constitutional convention at which the Black Student Union was established.

Junior Al Lizana, a double major in Social Thought and Political Economy and Afro-American Studies, also chosen to serve as interim vice president at the convention, says that the establishment of the Black Student Union will be setting a new precedent for the University.

"This is a very historic moment in the history of the Black community here at UMass. The Black Student Union is something that has been struggling to come into existence for a long time now and finally it has happened. This organization will prepare us to endure the challenges ahead of us."

The BSU's theme for the semester is entitled "Strengthening our foundation" according to Lizana.

"We believe that a strong organizational foundation is essential to the longevity of an organized community," he said.

Tonight's meeting will serve to give a general overview of the organization and its goals for the semester. Delphine Quarles, an advisor from the Student Activities Office, will also be present to address the students at the assembly.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A wonderful day for teaming up with others. Alliances of all types and sizes enjoy favorable influences. It is time you changed your thinking about a romantic connection.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Excitement and surprise fill the air now. Love strikes like lightening! A legal decree, job announcement or message from afar signals success. Defer to an older person's wishes this evening.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Keep your contacts with the public on a high level by offering inspiration. First impressions may not always prove reliable. Steer clear of people who are only out for themselves.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You or the people you work with could be on the edge now. Ignore any negative undercurrents and be a model of stability. Make certain changes in your diet to give you more energy.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Look over financial records carefully; you cannot assume all is well just because someone says so. A business plan could work out great if the initial outlay is not too high.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Attend to any unpaid bills today, and make certain your credit rating is good. Allowing your romantic partner to take charge of the social schedule has many benefits.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): By getting together and agreeing on procedures, you and your associates greatly increase your chances for success. Be willing to make intelligent compromises.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Positive influences surround you. Are you paying attention? Listen to higher-ups and learn from their experiences. Seek the help of experts, too. Romance is much improved the second time around.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Do not let your associates' enthusiasm go to waste. When allowed to work with you, they tend to be friendlier and more productive. A love relationship will transform your entire life.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Your determination to finish up whatever remains undone should lead to success. Lie low this afternoon and attend to family and domestic affairs.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): While financial stability lends strength to a union, money worries could strain it to the breaking point. Consult mate before investing jointly owned funds.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Powerful forces could block your efforts to reach an agreement with key associates. Avoid taking any unnecessary financial risks. Make certain that a lesson learned today will never be forgotten.

From prehistory to the Cosmic Cushion

Two art exhibits in Forbes Library display painting, sculpture and masks

By Emily Marino
Collegian Staff

I traveled to the Forbes Library in Northampton with a mission: to view the artwork of two diverse artists. I came back not only having seen the exhibits, but having found my "launch pad to inner peace."

Yes, for just $48.95, I, too can purchase my very own Cosmic Cushion. The makers of this invaluable product and I have one thing (besides an appreciation for cosmic medi(tation) in common: we realize the talent of Sonia R. Hillios, one of the artists whose work is being featured at the Forbes Gallery this month.

The folks at Sun and Moon Originals, the company that produces the Cosmic Cushion liked Hillios' work so much that they hired her to promote the cushion. Both the original print and finished advertisement can be viewed until September 30.

Sun and Moon Originals is not the only organization to take note of Hillios' talent, and the artist has been hired by such companies as Paramount, Republic Pictures, and Universal Studios.

Hillios' exhibit entitled "To the 24th Century and Beyond" features book covers, pins, prints and T-shirts created for television and movie promotions for projects including "Star Trek," (both original and current shows) "Beauty and the Beast," "Quantum Leap," and "Dick Tracy." Works can be purchased for between $650 and $700.

Hillios, who specializes in futuristic, science-fiction characters, has been a portrait artist and illustrator since 1979, and her work has been sold throughout the country.

The gallery's other exhibit, "Seeing with the Inner Eye: Dream Faces, Flowers and Spaces" by Claudia Zimmerman-Lipston carries the viewer in the opposite direction, and back through time.

This exhibit of paintings, masks and sculptures focuses on natural and even prehistoric subjects.

The eight clay and satin or terracotta masks represent the early "Hunter," "Gatherer," and "First Rag and Bone Man" and are titled accordingly. Other masks, ranging from stoic to "Innocent" (a favorite of mine) represent figures such as Aries or Zimmerman-Lipstons's vision of "Night Visitors."

Zimmerman-Lipston's clay sculptures, while primitive, natural and earthy, seemingly represent timeless, ageless emotion. "Coming Out," "Pouring Her Heart Out," and "The Fates" are just a few on exhibit.

Most of the artist's oil paintings highlight the beauty of flowers. These works, while life-like, exhibit a surreal quality, made possible by the mix and shadowing of dreamy pastels. Pieces may be purchased for between $118 and $680.

If you are looking for something to do this weekend or in the upcoming couple of weeks, I strongly urge you to visit or call the Forbes Library and view this exhibit. At the very least, you will be able to get the telephone number of Sun and Moon Originals and pick up one of those groovy Cosmic Cushions, which, by the way, come in berry, black, blue, green and purple.

IRONICALLY, THE TIME TO START SAVING FOR RETIREMENT IS WHEN IT LOOKS LIKE YOU CAN LEAST AFFORD IT.

Can't afford to save for retirement? The truth is, you can't afford not to. Not when you realize that your retirement can last 20 to 30 years or more. You'll want to live at least as comfortably then as you do now. And that takes planning.

By starting to save now, you can take advantage of tax-deferral and give your money time to compound and grow. Consider this: set aside just $100 each month beginning at age 30 and you can accumulate over $192,539* by the time you reach age 65. But wait ten years and you'll have to budget $227 each month to reach the same goal.

Even if you're not counting the years to retirement, you can count on TIAA-CREF to help you build the future you deserve—with flexible retirement and tax-deferred annuity plans, a diverse portfolio of investment choices, and a record of personal service that spans 75 years.

Over a million people in education and research put TIAA-CREF at the top of their list for retirement planning. Why not join them?

Call today and learn how simple it is to build a secure tomorrow when you have time and TIAA-CREF working on your side.

Start planning your future. Call our Enrollment Hotline 1 800 842-2888.

AD position perfect job for ex-coach Reid

When last we saw David Bischoff at the University of Massachusetts, he was making a pledge to clear his name of any wrong-doings found by the state legislature's probe of the athletic department's spending habits.

That's not exactly how top administrators want to end their careers. (See Nixon, Richard M.) Had the state not found evidence of faulty spending habits, junkets and meals with the dead, Bischoff would have closed his tenure out quietly on the north side of campus, overseeing the Mullins Arena, UMass's newest playground.

But fortune tends to have a nasty revenge streak. Now Bischoff, who in fiscal 1992 was paid more money than most of your professors - a cool $96,000 to be exact - has found himself on the wrong side of the fence. That is, the chain link fence he is alleged to have financed with UMass money.

Greg
SUKIENNIK

Like the Campus Center, the athletic department has a big mess and few janitors to clean it up. Fortunately, Glenn Wong, the interim athletic director, has by all accounts done an excellent job over at Boyden. The question remains, however: who will the University bring in to ensure credibility and budgetary restraint? Is there anyone out there in big-time college sports who actually holds these values in high esteem?

There is an answer to that question. His name is Jim Reid, and I challenge anyone to come up with a better candidate for Athletic Director of the University of Massachusetts.

Reid, as you may recall, left in a storm of controversy last spring when Bischoff, without telling Reid directly, cut the football team's scholarship money for the following year. Reid, rather than tell recruits he couldn't come up with the money he had promised, heeded his own values and quit on the spot.

Rumor had it that Reid, who now coaches defense at the University of Richmond, was interested in replacing Bischoff. Those rumors proved false when Reid did not submit an application for the post.

Now, it's not likely that Reid would want to leave coaching football to become an administrator. I'll also bet he wouldn't want to put pressure on current UMass football coach Mike Hodges by becoming the ex-coach looking over his successor's shoulder.

Also, consider that Reid could very possibly become head football coach at Richmond after the contract of current head Spider Jim Marshall runs out. Marshall hasn't fared well (4-29 before this season) and in the football-crazy south, either you win or hit the road. Reid has gone on record as dismissing such possibilities, but stranger things happen in college sports.

But I'm issuing the challenge anyway. Jim Reid is one of those rare individuals who believes college athletics serve a more important role than the generation of revenue. Like building character, for example. Reid is an intensely competitive man, but possesses a personal integrity which demands rules are followed. He slept on hotel floors and packed his team sandwiches for road trips, so he knows the value of a dollar here at UMass.

Indeed, there are no better qualified candidates for the position of athletic director at the University of Massachusetts than Jim Reid. There are other women and men who could fill the position well, granted. Glenn Wong is one of these people. But there are no better custom fits than a man who spent 18 years here and turned down obscene amounts of money and perks from an Ivy League school because he wanted to be here. In Amherst.

I certainly hope the search committee sees this little column. I also hope Reid somehow gets a hold of it. Because I'm challenging both of them to do what's best for UMass.

Minutemen keep record perfect

Men's soccer takes 3-0 decision over Holy Cross

By ARTHUR STAPLETON

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Stephan Scott, shown here in last weekend's game against Temple, and the UMass soccer team posted a 3-0 win over Holy Cross Tuesday. The men's team is now 4-0.

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team entered Tuesday's game worrying about two things: the Holy Cross Crusaders, as well as a letdown after their 6-1 win over Temple.

Though struggling early on, the Minutemen made it past both obstacles, en route to a 3-0 win at Garber Field.

"This was a tough game because of the big win against Temple. We had to get up once again for Holy Cross, which had been struggling. It was a hard thing to do," said UMass head coach Sam Koch.

Yesterday's game was marked by UMass' failure to convert on numerous opportunities. They took 21 shots, finally breaking the scoring drought at 21:08 of the first half.

UMass' Justin Edelman took a pass from junior Randy Jacobs and put it past Holy Cross junior goalie Dave Stalter. Jacobs came up the sideline, slipped past the Holy Cross defender, and slid the pass to Edelman, who promptly booted it into the net and gave UMass a 1-0 lead.

The junior midfielder scored his second goal of the year, giving him six points in this young season.

Todd Kylish, the junior co-captain and UMass' leading scorer, seemed to dominate on defense, allowing sophomore goalie Mark Wolf to get his first shutout of the year.

"We came out a bit sluggish. Our defense played well, and we got the shutout, which is what we wanted," said Kylish.

UMass scored the second goal at 57:20 of the second half when junior co-captain Shawn Bleau took a pass and blasted it past the diving Stalter. Bleau's goal was assisted by both sophomore Mike Doyle and freshman Dave Yurick.

"The shots seemed to be going in the net a little easier on Saturday. It took extra work to get the goals in," said Bleau.

The final goal by the Minutemen came at 70:30 of the second half, as freshman Colin Johnson chipped in a goal off the pass from Jacobs and Bleau. This goal buried Holy Cross for good, sealing a 3-0 victory for UMass.

Wolf only faced 2 shots, saving both. The only threat he had to ward off came late in the game when Holy Cross caught the UMass goalie out of position. The Crusaders ripped a shot at the open net, but were thwarted as junior Ted Priestly stepped in the way of the shot. Wolf then covered up, securing the shutout.

The next game for UMass is its first road game of the year. The Minutemen travel to Rhode Island on Saturday at 1 p.m. for another big A-10 divisional contest.

"It is a big game against Rhode Island, and we have three days practice to prepare. I think we're ready," said Kylish.

Goal notes: UMass was without junior defenseman Matt Edgerly, who has been injured since the first game of the season. Edgerly is expected to return on Saturday against URI.

Randy Jacobs, with two assists against Holy Cross, pushed his season point total to 8. He is tied for the team lead with Kylish.

Dave Yurick gathered his first points of his young career with an assist on Bleau's goal.

Yankee Conference notebook

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts football team has undeniably one of the most difficult first two weeks of the season in Division 1-AA. Last week, the Minutemen kicked off their 1992 campaign against the No. 2 team in Division 1-AA, the Delaware Fighting Blue Hens; this Saturday, UMass will face the No. 6 team in the country, the Holy Cross Crusaders.

Last week's 33-13 loss was a tough one indeed as UMass led at halftime 13-12 and had the Delaware stadium crowd as quiet as a funeral procession. Delaware came out firing in the third quarter though, as quarterback Bill Vergantino dashed seven yards for the touchdown and the 18-13 lead (Vergantino's pass failed). This was followed by a 21-yard run by Delaware's Daryl Brown (game high 183 yards rushing, 1 TD) and a fourth quarter TD by Walter Hicks which essentially killed UMass' chances. There were, however, many bright spots in this game for the Minutemen.

Freshman red-shirt quarterback Andrew McNeilly's performance raised a lot of eyebrows (including the UMass coaches) as he passed for 119 yards on 8-18 completions and one TD and rushed for 41 yards, good enough to earn him a starting job next weekend against the Crusaders.

McNeilly's perfect, 44-yard second quarter touchdown pass to split end Matt Read (three receptions, 69 yards) had to be the highlight of the game on the maroon side. Leading the way for the Minutemen in rushing was tailback John Johnson, who had 52 yards, and one touchdown on 13 attempts.

On defense, inside linebacker Phil Latrigue was an animal, piling up 20 tackles, including 14 unassisted tackles and two QB sacks — good enough to be named to the Yankee Conference honor roll. Outside linebacker Scott Assencoa had a solid game as well as he tallied up six unassisted tackles.

Reasons for the UMass defeat, however, can be found in those statistics that no one ever bothers to look at after a game. First, UMass succeeded on only 1-of-10 third down conversions while Delaware connected on over half (8-13). The time of possession (34:32-25:28) wasn't overwhelmingly in Delaware's favor, but when you look what Delaware did with that time, you can tell why they won. The Blue Hens had 74 offensive plays to 52 for UMass and totaled 407 yards on offense to 280 yards for the Minutemen.

The notebook's filling up pretty fast, so let's look to the rest of the Yankee Conference. First off, What's up with the University of New Hampshire? After earning conference championship honors with Villanova and Delaware last year, the Wildcats are off to a roaring start at 0-2. Head Coach Bill Bowes says he's trying to find some sort of silver lining in his team's first two games but at last check, he was still looking.

One bright spot is that after their first game, senior tailback Barry Bourassa had a total of 4,801 all-purpose career yards and trailed the YC's all-time leader, UMass's Garry Pearson, by just 436 yards (he had 79 yards rushing last week). Looking strong so far in the league has been Maine, which now has a 2-0 record, the University of Richmond, that had an offense that racked up 49 points (but a defense that gave up 40) and Villinova, which scored a shutout against Bucknell, 34-0.

Yankee Notables: Rookie of the Week: Running back Ray Baur of Maine (18-88 rushing, 2-23 receiving), Offensive Player of the Week: Quarterback Greg Lilly of Richmond (313 yds passing), Defensive Player of the Week: Inside linebacker Jim Reppi of UConn.

Undefeated Minutewomen facing road test against Friars

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Last year, the University of Massachusetts field hockey team beat Providence College en route to a blazing eight-game winning streak to start the season. This year, the Minutewomen, who are 2-0, travel to Providence to face the Friars (3:30 p.m.).

Same thing, different year?

Well, for one thing, UMass has the services of Philippa Scott in net again, and she is well on her way to repeating her fine performance last season. Scott, a senior from Corsham, England, posted a 2-0 record in goal last week, recording 11 saves total against Boston College and the University of New Hampshire and was named Atlantic 10 Defensive Player-of-the-Week.

In fact, Scott came within one goal of posting back-to-back shutouts, allowing one shot past her in UMass's 2-1 season-opening win against BC. In fact, UMass coach Pam Hixon said the goal should have been disallowed because it was way above the regulation height.

Nevertheless, Scott's 0.50 goals-against-average, which is the best in the A-10, can also be attributed to a strong Massachusetts defense and midfield. The combination of co-captains Joy Blenis and Kathy Phelan and defenseman Tracy Barclay is intact, and newcomer Natalie Hart has strengthened the D.

Providence (2-0) has also started the season strong, defeating Michigan State 4-2 and squeaking past Connecticut, 3-2 in overtime. The Friars have outshot their opponents 43-28.

One change for Providence will be in net. The Friars will probably start Gina Martinello, who is 2-0, instead of Debbie Hagie, who was the starter for Providence last year.

The question is, can the Minutewomen repeat last year's outcome against a tougher Friar squad?

Weld proposal may try to spur growth

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. William F. Weld's jobs package reportedly will mix some of the tax incentives he proposed in January with pledges to invest state money as seed capital for businesses.

Weld, in an announcement prepared for a joint session of the Legislature today, would call for three programs to use state money as venture capital for emerging technology companies, small businesses and export firms, said The Boston Globe.

The state would promise relatively small amounts of money for businesses to use as capital, and to induce banks and other lenders to invest in Massachusetts companies.

Weld reportedly was likely to call for an investment tax credit and other tax code changes in an effort to spark growth.

In January, Weld proposed a one-time 20 percent tax bonus tax credit for plant equipment investment.

"We would prefer to see a more permanent investment tax credit," Richard Lord, senior vice president of the 3,000 member Associated Industries of Massachusetts, told the Boston Herald.

"That could serve to make the cost of capital a little less."

But Lord said Weld's plans probably wouldn't make a lasting impact.

"Recovery at the national level is what would be most important for companies in Massachusetts, but the governor can do some things to improve the perceived business climate in Massachusetts," he said.

The Globe said officials who had seen a draft of Weld's plan said the venture capital proposal has three components:

- Creating an emerging technical fund with more than $15 million in state money, plus loan guarantees for small and mid-sized companies that can't raise capital through equity markets or from direct lending banks.
- Making available small accounts of seed capital to growing companies, a program modeled after a $3.7 million program in Michigan that officials there said spurred $80 million in private investment capital in more than 1,600 loans in five years.
- Formulating a finance plan to leverage private companies specializing in products for overseas markets.

Last week, Wall Street upgraded the state's bond rating, and Weld asserted that Massachusetts' "fiscal crisis is over." But Susanne Tomkins, vice president of the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation, said that declaration was premature.

"If I were the people concerned about school reform or local governments that haven't seen improvement in their fiscal situation, I would be concerned about hearing the governor suggest that tough fiscal times were behind us," she said.

Links sought in murder

BOSTON (AP) — State and federal authorities reportedly are looking into a possible link between the killing of a Northwest Airlines employee and an alleged credit card scam.

Susan Taraskiewicz's body was found Monday in the trunk of her car. She worked at the airline's office at Logan International Airport.

The investigation into Taraskiewicz's death coincides with an ongoing inquiry of about 30 Northwest Airlines employees suspected of taking part in a credit card scam, according to yesterday's Boston Herald.

"The Homicide Unit is exploring all possible ties," Carmen Field, a spokeswoman for the Suffolk County district attorney's office told the newspaper.

The investigation by state police and the U.S. Treasury Department centers on Logan Airport airline employees who have access to U.S. bulk mail and allegedly stole new credit cards before they reached their rightful owners.

The employees allegedly took the cards and sold them to an underground network for several hundred dollars. Charges were then made on the cards.

The credit card company did not immediately realize the charges were fraudulent because the rightful recipients had not reported the cards stolen.

Jon Austin, a spokesman for Northwest Airlines headquartered in Eagan, Minn., said he had no comment on either investigation. He referred any questions about Taraskiewicz's death to authorities.

Biofeedback system offers tension relief

Dr. Benjamin Levy of University Health Services hooks a thermo-regulator to a student taking a late-summer swim in the Campus Pond as sophomore legal studies major Jason Zupka looks on.

Do you suffer from severe headaches every time you have an exam? Are you tired of dealing with the incessant pain of an ulcer? Then maybe biofeedback is the answer to your ailments.

The University of Massachusetts's Health Services has a treatment called biofeedback which, depending on the person, can effectively cure ailments such as muscle tension headaches and improve symptoms from illnesses such as ulcer disease, hypertension and cardiac disease, according to Health Services staff.

Dr. Benjamin Levy, a psychiatrist at the University's Health Services, said biofeedback is a valuable treatment because it teaches the patient to identify and control his or her own symptoms without the use of medicines or surgery.

"It helps the person become self-sufficient and enables them to prevent or diminish the intensity of their problems," he said.

Levy said the computerized biofeedback system monitors several physical responses which are stress-related. A few of these responses include skin temperature, muscle tension and electrical impulses on the skin.

Dr. Bruce Taub-Bynum, founder and director of the behavioral medicine clinic, said the patient then learns to relax their cardiovascular and circulatory systems.

"This is usually done with positive imagery, muscle relaxation techniques and diaphragmatic breathing," said Levy.

Levy said positive imagery means different things for different people. "Some people use self-hypnosis to relax, while others use visual or auditory images," he said.

Levy said to do the diaphragmatic breathing technique a person pushes their abdomen out as they inhale and passively lets their abdomen fall back down as they exhale.

"This breathing technique is used by singers and horn and wind instrumentalists," Levy said.

Levy said a treatment for a person who always gets migraine headaches before exams would be to use diaphragmatic breathing and positive imagery.

"These techniques may prevent the person from spiraling into an intense physical state every time they have an

Evangelist holds forum for religious discussion

Says UM has "tremendous prejudice against God."

By JACK O'HALLORAN

Evangelist Cliff Knechtle

Inviting onlookers to ask questions on theological matters, evangelist Cliff Knechtle held what he called an "open-air dialogue" on the Student Union steps yesterday afternoon.

The discussion series, entitled "Isn't Christianity a Crutch for the Weak?" was sponsored by the Inter-Varsity and Graduate Christian Fellowships. Today's noon dialogue will be the final of three provided this week.

The often embattled Knechtle enthusiastically answered questions from a diverse gathering of over 100 students.

Most of the questioners were in disagreement with Knechtle, prompting him to respond: "There is a tremendous prejudice here at UMass-Amherst against God. Combative" is how student Alex LaManias described the minister, commenting, "He loses his temper easily." "Life is an experiment. I don't know. We are all individuals We know what is right and wrong," said student Mike LaRocco.

"Why must we all believe in one God? Why can't we believe what we want as long as we don't cause harm to others?" LaRocco asked.

"God gave us free will because we asked for it," countered Knechtle, girding his assertion that God is not responsible for human suffering, but that people are.

Knechtle often used the word "context" when questioned about specific portions of the Bible, prompting many to accuse him of bending the words in that book to fit his assertions.

"People are just not grasping what he's saying" said student Jim Hoover, a supporter of the minister.

Outright agreement was not in evidence, although many among the crowd appeared devoutly religious. Knechtle gladly entertained debate from people of different faiths.

In addition, questions of race came up repeatedly with people asking the minister how he knew that Jesus was a white man.

"Jesus was not black or white. He was a first century Jew, with a Jewish mother. He was a brown man," Knechtle replied.

One passerby attempted to deride the minister by crying "Long live Evolution."

Knechtle, in a departure from the evangelical stereotype, does not discredit Darwinian theory.

"There is too much evidence" to discredit evolution, he said. "Evolution was the source of creation."

During the three-hour debate, one man began writhing on the ground, feigning uncontrollable religious fervor.

Another man, also in apparent jest, knelt in front of Mr. Knechtle saying "You are Jesus" for several minutes.

exam," Levy said.

Levy said the correlation between between a person's stress and physical state determines how successful the treatment will be.

"If a person has a willingness to practice the breathing and muscle relaxation techniques at home, then they have a better chance of being completely helped," he said.

"Biofeedback is not the answer for everyone," said Levy. Some other interventions people opt for are yoga, meditation, acupuncture and regular excercise, he said.

Biofeedback was first used in the first half of the century to treat stroke patients by trying to retrain the injured muscles, Levy said.

He said in the 1960s there was a shift toward examining different tension states measured by biofeedback in combination with relaxation techniques.

"This has helped people find relief from a wide variety of stress-related symptoms," Levy said

"In the last decade, biofeedback treatment has been used to also measure general physical health," said Levy.

Homeless man wins scholarship

BOSTON (AP) — A 31-year-old homeless man has been awarded a four-year scholarship to study at Suffolk University.

Kevin Davis, who has lived at a Boston homeless shelter since May 1991, will begin classes in September as a finance major at the University's School of Management.

"I always wanted to go to college and now I can," Davis said in a statement released by Suffolk on Wednesday.

Davis was accepted under Suffolk's annual homeless student scholarship program, which was established last year after the university awarded a future scholarship to a 9-year-old homeless girl, Zakia Cox of Boston.

Davis was chosen from among 13 applicants who were selected for interviews, said Chris Perry, director of financial aid at Suffolk.

"He was very enthusiastic about coming and getting a college education," Perry said. "We were struck by the seriousness of his purpose."

UM education program seeks high standards

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Correspondent

Selectivity is necessary in order to improve the future quality of our schools, according to a University of Massachusetts education professor.

Clement A. Seldin, an associate professor in the University of Massachusetts School of Education, said that since 1988, the Elementary Teacher Education Program (ETEP) has instituted a new set of standards designed to select the top students in the education major.

Seldin believes that teaching qualifications have become minimal, allowing mediocre teachers in our elementary schools. To combat this, ETEP has a rigorous acceptance program that includes a comprehensive portfolio. Although grades are an important part of the selection process, they are not the top priority.

Candidates must also be interviewed, submit letters of recommendation and personal statements in order to be considered.

All this adds up to a four-hour decision-making process in which only 25 to 30 students are accepted every semester. This represents only 40 percent of the students in the education department.

Although Seldin admits the program is not perfect, he says it's necessary to improve the future of education. He claims that there are many students that he'd love to accept, but they just don't meet the requirements. Seldin disagrees that enthusiasm is enough to make competent teachers. "Motivation, by itself, isn't sufficient," he says.

For those who don't make the cut, alternatives are available. These students, mostly juniors, can reapply with the help of Seldin, who makes suggestions on how to strengthen the portfolio.

Other students transfer to different schools where standards are not as rigorous. Students have the opportunity to graduate without certification and receive it later in the graduate program.

Seldin says he knows his standards are tough and honestly feels for those who are rejected. "I lose sleep over it every semester," Seldin says.

He says he still feels, however, that this policy is necessary and not designed to scare prospective teachers. "Those students who are the best in the field should be eager to accept the competition and willing to go after it full throttle."

Teacher education director Richard Clark says he agrees with Seldin. He supports the strong admissions program and exit requirements. Clark says he believes future teachers need to be understanding, caring and concerned.

As for the selection process, Clark says he believes it is not as dependent on academic performance as other fields. "Selectivity is more than tests and courses. . . it's multidimensional," Clark said. These students need to share a willingness to handle an intense workload and have the strength to cope with stress, according to Clark.

Education professor Robert Sinclair says he believes the United States has an obligation to educate all children,

BSU holds opening Assembly

Speaker stresses necessity of student contribution

By MARTIN F. JONES

The first General Assembly of the newly-established Black Student Union last drew a "very receptive" response from the over 75 students who attended, according to the organization's interim president.

Interim president Fabiola Narcisse, who gave the opening address at the meeting held at the Malcolm X Cultural Center, stressed the role of the Black Student Union as a support organization designed to help Black students and Registered Student Organizations on campus.

Narcisse said she found the response of the audience to be generally positive.

"The people were very receptive," Narcisse said. "They seemed genuinely interested in what the BSU has to offer."

Keynote speaker Delphine Quarles, an advisor from the Student Activities Office, spoke about her 12 years of experience in working with student groups at UMass.

"An organization is only as good as the people in it," she said, and stressed the importance of broad participation from the entire body.

There was an attempt made to establish a Black Student Union seven years ago, but the organization failed due to lack of participation, according to Quarles.

"Too much work was being done by one person," she said. "Everyone should focus on one piece of the organization and make their contribution to it."

Al Lizana, interim vice president of the Black Student Union, gave the audience an update and overview of the work undertaken to bring the organization to its present point.

Students then reviewed the organization's constitution, which had been revised from the one used at the constitutional convention held last spring. After some floor debate the audience accepted the new constitution without any further revisions.

The assembly finally ended following announcements by student representatives from other campus RSOs.

Lizana expressed satisfaction with the meeting, saying that it "marks a positive turning point in the development of our community."

Jewish figures honored

Ceremony offers opportunity to reflect

By MIMI FELLNER
Collegian Correspondent

One of the founders of the Chabad House praised several prominent figures from Jewish history in a ceremony marking their birthdays Tuesday night.

Rabbi Edelman of Springfield, who has been in Springfield for over 40 years, was the guest speaker at Tuesday's Chabad House ceremony. Rabbi Adelman of Chabad House, who introduced Edelman, said the Rabbi was instrumental in the opening of Chabad in 1974.

The two great figures of Judaism that Edelman spoke about that evening were the Ba'al Shem Tov, a great leader of the Chasidic movement, and also the Alter Rebbe-Rabbi Shneur Zalman, the first Lubavitcher Rebbe.

This Tuesday "Chay Elul" (the hebrew date for the 18th day of the month of Elul) marked the birthday of these two great leaders in Jewish history. The party at the Chabad House honored this event.

A small group of about 20 people gathered to honor the two men and held a ceremony with an assortment of refreshments, including seedless grapes, roasted peanuts and homemade coffee cake.

Rabbi Zalman wrote the "Tanya" — a major work which is the basic philosophy of Chabad Lubavitch Chasidut.

Chabad Lubavitch Chasidut is a Chasidic branch of Judaism which teaches us how to serve God and mankind, according to Rabbi Edelman.

Rabbi Edelman spoke about the advent of the Ba'al Shem Tov and the major impact his movement made on Jews throughout the world. Jews at the time were disillusioned because of their poverty and the oppressive governments' under which they lived, Edelman said. He instilled new joy and vitality in their lives through prayer, learning and song, according to Edelman.

"With his insights the Ba`al Shem Tov instilled a feeling of unity for Jewish people all over the world," said Rabbi Edelman. This statement was followed by more singing produced by the Ba`al Shem Tov and more rounds of vodka with "to life" echoing through the room.

The speech continued with an overview of the second great leader-Rabbi Shneur Zalman, the initiator of the Chabad Lubavitch movement.

Rabbi Edelman explained how Rabbi Zalman instilled unity and love in the Jewish people. He stressed that the way to keep the Jewish nation strong is for Jewish people to love one another, whether they are rich, poor, Orthodox or Reform.

Edelman said if one is a Jew, they are part of this "oneness" which should serve to unite all Jews.

Former UM professor and juice inventor dies

GRANTHAM — Kirby M. Hayes, 69, an inventor of the popular Cranapple style juice drink, died July 27, 1992, at the Dartmouth-Hitchcock Medical Center, Lebanon.

Mr. Hayes gained national recognition through his work on frozen food handling.

Born Aug. 26, 1922 in Pocasset, Mass., the son of Stephen and Gertrude (Rudolph) Hayes and had lived in Grantham for the past seven years. He previously lived in Amherst for 35 years.

Mr. Hayes attended the University of Massachusetts at Amherst where he earned a master's degree in Food Science in 1948.

During that time, he discovered the blending technique of apple and cranberry juice to produce Cranapple juice that is appealing to the eye and taste.

After graduate school, he worked for the Poultry Branch of the United States Department of Agriculture in Washington, D.C.

He joined the faculty of the University of Massachusetts in Amherst in 1951 and retired as a full professor in 1985.

He was a veteran of World War II, serving in the Pacific area in the United States Army until 1946. He then joined the Army Reserves and retired as Lieutenant Colonel in 1982.

He was a member of the Institute of Food Technologists and served as a council representative and a past president of IFT North East Section.

In Grantham, Mr. Hayes served as health officer and was a member of Eastman Board of Directors. He was a member of the Country Squires of New London.

He was a member of the South Congregational Church of Newport.

He leaves his wife of 42 years, Elizabeth (Collyer) Hayes, of Grantham; two daughters, Ellen Wienberg of Manchester and Linda Williams of Franklin; three grandchildren; a brother, Stephen P. Hayes of Centerville, Mass.; a niece; two nephews and cousins.

Donations in his memory may be made to the Department of Food Science, Chenoweth Laboratory, in care of Dr. Fergus Clydesdale at the University of Massachusetts.

Funeral arrangements are under the direction of the Newton-Bartlett Funeral Home, Newport.

from all backgrounds and to do it well. Future teachers need to be competent and creative with a strong sense of the diversity of the children they teach.

Sinclair says he thinks it is an exciting time to be an educator, and that people need the passion and the competence necessary to succeed.

"Passion alone isn't enough, however, neither is competence — our future teachers need an equal balance of both," Sinclair said.

Dawn Bond, a graduate student in the education program, said she wasn't as supportive of Seldin's ideas. She is not in ETEP, nor has she ever applied, but says she believes that the judgements made on admissions are different for every student.

These judgements are random and selective and there is some question as to who decides which students are accepted and which are rejected, according to Bond. She also wondered if perhaps the program is too selective.

Rabbi Zalman also taught the importance of women in the Jewish religion. Women are associated with everything good or kind in the world and are, as Rabbi Edelman says, "closer to sanctity than men."

Rabbi Zalman taught the idea of being kind, charitable and honest to one another.

After the speech, Rabbi Edelman opened the floor to questions from the listeners.

When asked what the Hebrew date of that day meant he said, "'Chay' (of Chay Elul) meaning 'life' conveys the hope of the Jewish people that god will bless us with life and happiness in the year ahead."

This was once again followed by a burst of singing and of course, another round of Absolut.

UMass profs produce report on crack usage

By LAURI HOWE
Collegian Correspondent

Two University of Massachusetts researchers who have been studying crack cocaine use among Jamaican women say that there doesn't seem to be any identifiable risk factors to signal who may become an addict.

Rebekah Hudgins, an independent anthropologist and graduate student in the School of Public Health, and Melanie Dreher, dean of the School of Nursing at UMass, studied crack use among 33 women in Kingston and St. Thomas, Jamaica, from July 1991 to January 1992.

The women studied typically left high school when they became pregnant for the first time and then had a series of unsuccessful relationships which, in many cases, led to additional pregnancies.

The women said they experienced crises such as the death of a family member or the ending of a relationship before first trying crack.

Only two of the women in the study thought that crack was forced on them. The others said they tried the drug because they were depressed or simply curious about the drugs effects.

"A surprising number came from stable, two-parent households," the study said. "All were literate, had some level of schooling, and had an impressive ability to articulate and conceptualize their problems and lifestyles."

The study says that the most damaging effects on babies born to crack addicts comes from the environment, not in-utero exposure. Hudgins and Dreher say that these findings support the theory suggested by other studies of cocaine exposure in children — that the most harmful effects to children are from poor child-rearing environments rather than prenatal exposure to the drug.

Of the 70 children born to the women studied, only eight were exposed to crack prenatally. Hudgins and Dreher found it difficult to assess the possible effects of prenatal exposure to crack because children in Jamaica are often taken from crack-addicted mothers by relatives.

The role of the community in prevention of crack use and early intervention was an important finding in the study. Eighteen of the women studied are still active users. Fifteen of the women who said they have discontinued their drug use mentioned that a critical factor in being able to stop was having the support of family, friends, and neighbors.

Hudgins and Dreher say that the lack of prior knowledge about the effects of crack, which was reported by almost all of the women studied, is a good indicator of the potential effectiveness of an educational prevention program.

Hey, this is the real world

I was relaxing by the campus pond between classes the other day, sitting under my favorite tree. There was that pleasant breeze that always seems to be present at the pond that causes the ripples in the water and makes the muddy water look really kind of pretty. It's so relaxing sometimes to just lay down and watch the ducks and the people across the way while waiting for your class to start.

It made me just incredibly happy to be back here after three months of asking whether customers wanted sugar or plain cones with their ice cream. You'd figure some people would catch on after a couple of times, but no, they just keep sitting there like anxious puppies waiting for you to ask them whether or not they want their damn sugar or plain cones. It kind of makes you wonder about people, working at a job like that.

Nathan
CRICK

There was some strange man who would always drop by the place and come back to talk to the employees. Nobody knew who the hell he was, he'd just been coming there for so long we just kind of accepted him. He'd help put frozen french fries in little bags for us just because he had nothing better to do. What a life.

That's why I am so glad to be back. In fact, that's why most people, it seems, are glad to be back. Life, or the lack thereof. Did you ever notice how incredibly dull most people seem when you come home from college?

In my town, some brave soul proposed to put in a pool hall behind the newly built McDonald's on the corner. There was an article in the paper about the town meetings that were held on whether or not to give them a permit. To quote the opponents of the pool hall: "People who go to pool halls typically are people who get drunk and get in fights," "Those who play pool are generally unsavory people," and of course our police chief, always concerned for our safety, "I am frankly scared to death what might happen there."

I live in a town that had one hundred people in my high school class, and only a few of us played pool, myself included. I never really noticed I was unsavory, but I always did live in a constant state of denial. Even so, you can't scoff at being unsavory; at least you're something. Not just some lifeless lump that goes to the coffee shop every morning to bitch about things like pool halls just for the sake of bitching about things like pool halls.

The thing is that these people that apparently have no real interest in their lives besides talking about town politics and being undecided about the kind of cones under their ice cream, are, in fact, the people considered part of this mysterious Real World that we, as UMass students, are excluded from participating in. I never quite understood the rationale that simply because we go to college we have no idea what this Real World is like.

I look at it this way. We, as human beings, are alive until we die. We are also, at least within the bounds of our conceptions and excluding any metaphysical theories, living in this world that we perceive to be real. I don't really see how God could ordain that all humans are to live on this Earth as full and active participants but exclude anyone who happens to attend a university.

It seems as if we all have a conception that our life at UMass is just some imaginary circus world that doesn't really count in the grand scheme of things. Yet here we have probably the greatest control over our destinies we will ever have, and at the same time the greatest freedom. And strangely enough, it seems that we also have the most fun. Does this make it all some kind of game? I don't understand how our years here could be worth any less or be any more unrealistic than after we graduate.

We all seem to have an idea of this imaginary real world where suddenly we graduate and there it is. As if the true meaning of our lives will be revealed to us and we will look back at what we used to be and laugh at how ignorant and disillusioned we all were. Well, it doesn't happen. When we leave here maybe some of us will get lucky and find a good job, buy an apartment, get married and whatnot, but I don't think we'll ever find that illusionary Real World.

We'll just keep living, wondering when the Meaning of Life is going to fall on top of us and smother our misconceptions of the world that we learned at UMass. And while we wait for this revelation to come, our lives waste away until we are left sitting in coffee shops pretending our existences have purpose.

We are just as much part of the world now as we ever will be, and to assume anything less is to carelessly throw away precious years of our lives, and that is something we cannot afford to do. Even the most unsavory of us.

Nathan Crick is a UMass student.

Upcoming election offers two meaningless choices

Hmmm. Eeeny meeny miney moe, catch a. . . oh, there's supposed to be a column here? Well. you caught me off guard. I was just practicing how to decide between two saddest presidential candidates in history.

Remember those "disenfranchised voters" you read about when H. Ross Perot was still playing pretend candidate? I suppose I'm one of them. Not because "the system has failed," or "all incumbents must die horrible, slow, nasty deaths," but for another reason: neither Bill Clinton nor George Bush are qualified for the position.

Greg
SUKIENNIK

Weird, isn't it? Everyone else looking for a job must compete with hundreds of out-of-work professionals who have much more experience and better qualifications. But if you're running for President of the United States, you need only be "the failed governor of a small state" or "the failed president of a ruined industrial nation." And here's me, trying to land a newspaper job this whole time.

Let's start with the challenger, Bill Clinton. Sensing a rare chance at the presidency, Democrats everywhere have leapt upon the Clinton bandwagon, forgetting all the nasty things they said about him in New Hampshire nearly a year ago.

Did Clinton change? No, Paul Tsongas dropped out of the race and kept his yap shut (or had it shut for him) like a good little partisan.

Do I trust the man? Sure. Do I think his economic plan is smoke and mirrors? Yes. Do I think he's pandering to special interests to win himself an election? Of course he is. Which politician doesn't pander?

I mean, I want to like Clinton, but I just don't see where he's going to get the money to do all this "investing" he's been talking about. Taxing the wealthy more equitably is a start, but the amount of revenue such cuts would create can't pay for everything.

That's what worries me about Clinton. Not whether or not he dodged the draft 20 years ago. "Tax 'n' spend" is glib Republican rhetoric, but who wants to bet it might not be true?

As for Bush? Ha. Twelve years ago, Bush elicited so little confidence from the Republican party that he lost in the primaries to an ex-B-movie actor by the name of Reagan. Michael Dukakis may have been the only politician he could beat in a presidential election. New Bush strategy idea: Get Mikey back in the race. Make fun of his wife, too. It's proven and effective.

Fortunately for Bush, he had a wonderful chance to get back in the race at the Republican convention in Houston. But like the narrator in Jimmy Buffet's song "A Pirate Looks at Forty," Bush and the Republicans "pissed it away so fast." With the entire nation watching on free TV time, the GOP ignored the opportunity to present a clear alternative to Clinton's economic plan and took cheap shots at Hillary Clinton instead.

With that chance gone, Bush now must run on his record. Oops. Foreign policy wizardry? Ask jailed dissidents in China or refugees in Bosnia about Bush's foreign policy prowess.

Really, beating Iraq with brute force and claiming it was a master stroke of foreign policy is kind of like knocking over a 7-11 Slurpee store and taking credit for the Great Train Robbery. Compared to real diplomacy — and war is rarely diplomatic — beating the snot out of Iraq was the easy way out. I'm not impressed.

As for Bush's economic record? I won't even waste my time answering that one. Unless working at Burger King is your idea of prosperity.

So what's a disenfranchised voter to do? A lot of people still think Perot's going to jump back into the race, singing, "here I come to save the day," like Mighty Mouse. The comparison isn't that farfetched: compare their ear sizes and see for yourself.

But voting for Ross might only screw up the electoral college instead and give us some mutant Clinton-Quayle administration. See? Isn't democracy fun? It's a complete Catch-22, and the election is less than two months away.

"None-of-the-above" is a waste of time and electoral privilege. Ross Perot is not coming back. Bush and Clinton both have glaring weaknesses which I can't ignore, even for the sake of partisanship. Neither Barbara Bush nor Hillary Clinton — two likable people I could vote for — are on the ballot.

Eeeny meeny miney moe. . .

Morrissey should just grow up

I am writing this in reference to the column titled, "Gay lifestyle examined," by Michael Morrissey (Collegian, Sept. 14]. Wow, what can I say about someone "trumpeting the ideal?" I could say, "He lives in a small world." Or, "Grow up." Or maybe even, "That's really sad." I chose the latter, but I feel that all three apply to the situation.

I am sorry to say, Michael, that you didn't raise the hair on the back of this liberal in the Happy Valley. I am writing to tell you that I had to lower my head in embarrassment at your quality of views.

I just really found the article quite pathetic and was saddened to hear that throughout your childhood you were wearing blinders.

Now, diversity can breed conflict, but only in circumstances where the individuals are "working" with a third grade intellect. This is my suspicion: that you are still living in your little world where you would like everyone to be just like you.

The fact that you are frightened isn't hidden by your weak quoting of the Bible (and out of context, I may add), or of your shallow opinions, but your fear of AIDS is very valid and should not be ignored. I also think that if you listen to what you said about "homosexuals taking over our country" you too will be forced to realize that your statement has a third grade mentality about it.

Fear not though, I am not here to criticize without also sharing my opinion on how to rid our minds, towns, campuses and cities of a most rancid disease — I'm talking about racism, prejudice and hate.

Try to stop classifying everyone as either Black, gay or Christian or however you divide yourselves from others. Try to picture the whole scope of things and not just what relates to your small world.

Think of people on a horizontal scale, where we are next to each other, together, instead of on a vertical scale where you apparently think that you are at the top, and that everyone who contains a fault, in your mind, lies below.

If these are your true views, then stand firm for what you believe, but I think there are other people you have saddened and disappointed besides myself who also feel pity for your meek and timid views.

Sorry to hear that Morton Downey, Jr., is your hero. Have you ever heard of Abraham Lincoln or Martin Luther King, Jr.?

Don't just stand there and watch — help stop the misery

That poor fox never had a chance. It was screaming and trying to drag itself out of the way of passing cars when I came upon it. I'd never seen a fox up close before and I was curious. I would rather have seen it in a zoo. It had apparently had both of its hind legs run over by a car and was in great pain.

I'd arrived just in time to stop and let the highway department take care of the animal. Two men got out of a state truck and walked to the middle of the road where the creature flailed about moving itself in circles with its front legs. One of them carried a shovel.

I know I should have known better, but at first I thought he was going to use the shovel to pick up the fox and carry it back to the truck. The spade looked about the right size to do the job and I was feeling pretty optimistic that day. All my delusions of a merciful and happy ending to this scenario disappeared when the man raised the shovel over his head.

He missed the first time. The fox moved in time to avoid the blow and the man broke his shovel in half on the pavement. The fox started to move in a definite direction at this point — away from guy with the shovel. The guy with the shovel, however, still had full power over his limbs and easily caught the animal with a second attempt. I closed my eyes for that.

Pain or death, which is worse? When is living not a worthwhile endeavor anymore? Mercy killing. Euthanasia.

When I was about five years old I killed a rabbit. My friend Frankie, who was also five at the time, saw a rabbit eating lettuce from the garden his family kept in the backyard. Having watched lots of Disney movies, like Old Yeller, in which farmers' sons would kill animals that tried to raid the henhouse and pillage the garden, we ran for his dad's rifle. Five-year-olds with guns. Bad idea, I know. We were five, sue us.

Marc
ELLIOTT

All we could find was one bullet, but for a kid, Frankie was a pretty good shot. The rabbit caught that one bullet in the leg. Now the rabbit lay there shivering violently, unable to move or run away from the two vicious children standing there, staring at it in awe. Pain. The rabbit was in pain. I knew it. Frankie knew it.

I'd lost a cat to old age several weeks before. It was beyond help and my parents explained to me that it was more humane to let go, to put it to sleep. I guess I understood what they had meant because five minutes after Frankie had wounded the rabbit, I crushed it with a sledgehammer I'd found in Frankie's garage. It was the humane thing to do. The poor thing was in pain, right?

It's odd how the circumstances can change your view of what is right and what is wrong. Normally, I would consider beating a small animal to death a despicable and deplorable act. But when it's apparent the animal is going to die eventually anyway, and it is lying in front of you in great pain, your view of what you are capable of doing is changed. What you think should be done and what you think can be done is actually very flexible. You wouldn't think a 5-year-old boy capable of crushing a rabbit unless that boy was deranged. But faced with a creature shaking with the force of its pain, that boy could close his eyes and do what his heart screams is wrong but his mind tells him is right.

If I hadn't been told earlier in life that it is better to end the misery than to stand by and watch, I might have let that rabbit suffer for hours until it died.

I call on everyone not to allow misery to continue. I call on people to stop misery when they see it. If you see a miserable person in great pain, end it — and I don't mean the same way I "helped" the rabbit — do something appropriate for the situation. Maybe what needs to be done is something you wouldn't do normally, something outside what you've encountered so far in life. Take the initiative and try to lend a hand. We can't always depend on the next person to do it for us. We have to do what we can when we see the pain. Don't just stand and watch.

Notes from the basement make their semester debut

This is the semester's first installment of "Notes from the Campus Center Basement," a weekly humor and commentary column. The column, which has been around since sometime in the mid-eighties, will be continued this semester by myself, Marc Elliott and perhaps an occasional guest writer.

Graffiti of the Week, long a mainstay of the column, is possible only with audience participation, so send suggestions to one of us down here at 113 Campus Center Basement (after all, I can only visit so many bathrooms). This week's comes from a Shawmut machine in Northampton: "664, the neighbor of the beast."

Josh
REYNOLDS

This summer Al Arpad, a local hero of mine, got tired of trying to write "Paper" all by himself, and canned it. Before closing shop, he plastered the campus with posters which presented a rather unflattering look at the campus.

"Sure you need character to be a good leader. . . (but) the University of Massachusetts will teach you to be a follower, because that's where the jobs are. Everything from the crushing bureaucracy to the mindlessly rigid course structure will condition your ego for the relentless years of mediocrity in your future."

In another poster titled, "So you've heard our library isn't competitive?" he suggests swiping reserve material from our understocked library with a razor is excellent training for the back-biting world of peon middle-management.

Two recent graduates are proving him wrong: if you've got the ambition, you can escape from this factory of service industry fodder.

Guy Glodis, and Teddy "marvelous" Maravelias, a pair of right-wing gingoists from the "Love-it-or-Leave-it" school, are running for state office. They've graduated from autoerotic press conferences on the Student Union steps to the world of politics.

Maravelias, who is locally famous for a love letter to the Late Sen. Joe McCarthy published in the Minuteman, and his involvement with the YAF (Young Eugenicists for Genocide), is running as a Republican for state representative in Danvers.

He won't be elected.

He keeps saying ridiculous things about the cancer of communism and the infestation of homosexuals in today's society.

Although several other aspiring individuals have managed to get themselves elected to office by saying stupid things to the papers, in this case, even on the relatively conservative and affluent North Shore, it doesn't seem to be working.

Glodis, on the other hand, probably will be elected. While on campus, he was a televangelist for the conservative faith, and ran a small-time talk show.

In spite of his similar, backward social politics, he's running as a Democrat. He won the Democratic primary for state senator on Tuesday.

Fascist Democrats are popular in this state right now, (Remember John Silber?) To quote a disgusted colleague, "Hitler could get elected as a Democrat in Worcester."

Back when they were undergrads I told a friend, "These guys would almost be entertaining if they weren't so dangerous." If you've got vision, UMass truly is a training ground for greatness.

Columnist overstepped bounds

Who is this Morrissey? His dictum telling gay and lesbian people how to live seems to suggest that he believes he is a god. I feel privileged to share my campus with a god. My concern, however, is that he ends by saying, "All I ask is that if you continue to practice it [the gay lifestyle], realize what you're doing. Being gay, like being straight, isn't something you should be proud about. Don't tell the world about it, we don't care." But surely Michael Morrissey does care. If not, why did he write the column? Why does he feel a need to tell the entire UMass community that he condemns a lifestyle he doesn't understand?

To borrow some words, what I find even more disgusting than the article itself is the audacity of this person emphasizing his right to engage in this activity. Morrissey obviously has no comprehension of his subject and I'm sorry that people outside our community might read this and feel that as it appears in the Collegian it is indicative of the calibre of students at this university. I hope to God that I am correct in believing this expression of small-mindedness and bigotry is definitely not reflective of the majority of the student body.

Despite the ignorance, the hatred is very real

I was angered and disheartened to read Michael Morrissey's editorial "Gay lifestyle examined." It truly amazes me that there still exists a belief system — call it what you will — like Morrissey's.

It is frightening to think that this man probably will pass on his ignorance and bigotry to another generation. Assuming, of course, that he is of the heterosexual persuasion, and uses his penis appropriately. (I have long since misplaced the instruction manual that came with my penis; referring to the editorial, I believe "ejaculation so as to procreate" was listed as Function B.)

Because he is so vehemently opposed to the homosexual lifestyle, one can only assume that Mr. Morrissey is "straight." If so, he is certainly not happy about it: "being gay, like being straight, isn't something that you should be proud of." He should have mentioned this key point earlier in his expose, so that those of us comfortable and happy with our lifestyles could have felt sorry for him sooner.

Thankfully, Morrissey alleviates any concern one may have about his desire to eliminate homosexuality by saying that he doesn't want to "kill all gays."

No, he just wants us to know exactly which of the body's "natural functions" we are violating, express his general disgust, expose our "ploys," tell us we don't know what discrimination is really like, prevent us from loving, teaching, adopting children, etc.

After carefully reviewing his criteria for what constitutes a better world for us all, I for one was relieved to note that Mr. Morrissey still "could be friends with a homosexual. . ." I sincerely hope that anyone — straight, gay, bisexual, whatever — could find enemies more palatable than Michael Morrissey.

Unfortunately, the problem with the Michael Morrisseys of the world is not so much what they hate, it is just that they hate. Luckily, the Morrisseys are easy to spot: just listen to them rant for a few moments and you quickly get the picture. Rational and open-minded individuals must be able to discern fact from the fear tactics of these bigots.

But this is not all. Moritz Goldstein, in Deutschjudischer Parnass, cites a more chilling fact that remains even after one has rallied in defense of their ideals or values: "We can easily reduce our detractors to absurdity and show them their hostility is groundless.

"But what does this prove? That their hatred is real. When every slander has been rebutted, every misconception cleared up, every false opinion about us overcome, intolerance itself will remain finally irrefutable."

Gay relationship isn't just physical

This letter is in direct response to Michael Morrissey's latest conservative appeal (Collegian, Sept. 14], in which he humbly condemned the lifestyle of thousands. I am a "Happy Valley liberal," and Mr. Morrissey's letter delighted me. It exposed many of the misconceptions that conservatives proudly proclaim in error about homosexuality, and advertised their basic misunderstanding of gay relationships. Mr. Morrissey would have us believe that gay men live solely to thrust their penises up each other's bottoms, and that gay women thrive on rubbing up against each other and plotting the elimination of the male sex from the planet. Needless to say, I see it differently.

The physical aspect of gay relationships, the actual physical expression of love, is a simple transcendence over social taboos to the complete giving of one's self to another. If Mr. Morrissey's penis is only used to urinate and ejaculate so as to procreate, I pity him. Many have learned to use theirs to "make love" — just an old romantic idea some of us still hold on to. The basis of a homosexual relationship is not physical, the manifestation of it is, and the same holds true for heterosexuals. As well as sharing the same virtues with homosexuals, heterosexuals also commit the same crimes: premarital sex, unprotected sex despite the threat of AIDS, etc.

One thing is certain. To be gay is no choice. One might as well suggest to an African-American that they simply change the color of their skin.

UM prof writes on marketing

By TAMI MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

If you need to brush up on your marketing skills or you are looking for the cutting-edge in marketing techniques, a University of Massachusetts professor has written the book for you.

Marketing professor Charles Schewe has recently released a new book titled, The Portable MBA in Marketing.

Co-written with Alexander Hiam, a consultant who resides in Amherst, the book uses case histories from such companies as L.L. Bean and Xerox to show how today's multibillion dollar corporations have adjusted to the changing marketplace.

"The case histories make the conceptual material come alive," Schewe said.

"Part of what makes this book so helpful is its degree of specialization," Schewe says. "This book is aimed specifically at marketing. It doesn't attempt to give you bits and pieces of all areas of the business world."

Ken Blanchard, author of the best-selling The One Minute Manager, praised the book.

"This is not just marketing at the MBA level, this is the new marketing," Blanchard said,

The book weaves together four themes which the authors see as essential to creating extraordinary marketing: providing world class customer service, pressing for total quality management, striving for continual innovation and stretching strategies to a global environment.

"This book will serve as a user's manual for the quiet revolution that is now percolating in U.S. business," Blanchard said.

Schewe teaches an MBA course as well as marketing management and international marketing for undergraduates.

Schewe said the book is intended as a review for people who have taken marketing classes and as an update.

"It's meant for managers who've never had a marketing class and need to get up to speed," Schewe said.

The book was the Fortune Book Club's featured selection for June.

"It's selling briskly," said Schewe.

Jewish humorist to speak at UMass

By JENNIFER L. PRESS

Joseph Telushkin

Jewish humor can go a long in helping people to understand the history and culture of the Jewish people, according to a noted Jewish humorist.

Author Joseph Telushkin will share his views with the UMass community on Monday Sept. 21 at 7:30 p.m. in Mahar Auditorium.

Telushkin, author of many educational books on Judaism, will be trying a change of pace with his latest book on Jewish humor.

Entitled Why is this Knight Different From All Other Knights? The One Hundred Best Jewish Jokes and What They Show About the Jews, it attempts to explain how Jewish humor can reveal much about the Jewish people themselves.

Telushkin has also written Jewish Literacy: The Most Important Things to Know About the Jewish Religion, Its People, and Its History and co-written, with Dennis Prager, two of the most influential Jewish books published in the last decade.

His first book, The Nine Questions People Ask About Judaism, is now the most widely-used source on introducing people to Judaism. His second book, Why the Jews? The Reason for anti-Semitism, challenges popular modern explanations prejudice against Jews.

The lecture is free to students and $3 to the general public. Everyone is welcome to hear this acclaimed speaker discuss his new book on Jewish humor.

Perot hints at re-entry in race for presidency

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Ross Perot, seeking to steer the election debate and force President Bush and Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton to address federal budget deficits, hinted he might re-enter the presidential race, it was reported.

In an interview published in today's Los Angeles Times, Perot held out the possibility that his political organization — United We Stand, America — might endorse Clinton if the Democratic presidential nominee confronts the deficit issue.

Perot says considering the huge swing vote his followers represent, Bush and Clinton would be "unrealistic" to continue to ignore the deficit issue.

To decide on running, Perot said, he would require a meeting involving all 50 state coordinators of his organization.

"If they said 'yes, go to it,' then we'd do it," Perot said in the Times account. "If I have to get in, I'll certainly be running to win in November."

Connally, a Democrat-turned-Republican who served as Treasury secretary during the Nixon administration, served as a Perot adviser during the Texas businessman's short, undeclared candidacy.

Perot announced nine weeks ago that he would not be a candidate, saying that since the Democratic Party had "revitalized" itself, he concluded he could not win.

He also said it would be disruptive for him to remain in the race because he might win enough electoral votes to throw the election into the House of Representatives.

Smoking poses threat

BOSTON (AP) — Cigarette smoking and heating equipment, often kerosene space heaters, are the leading causes of fatal house fires, according to a report.

The study, based on a review of fires in North Carolina, also confirms that smoke detectors save lives.

House fires are a major cause of death, especially among children and the elderly. In 1988, 552,500 residential fires in the United States claimed 5,065 lives and injured 22,600 more.

In the latest study, Dr. Carol W. Runyan and others from the University of North Carolina reviewed all 151 fatal fires in the state over a 13-month period and compared them with a sample of non-fatal fires.

• The largest number of fatal fires — 39 percent — were blamed on heating equipment. Of these, more than half were caused by space heaters, mostly kerosene heaters.

• Smoking caused 31 percent of fatal fires and 6 percent of non-fatal fires.

• The risk of fatality was higher in fires that happened in older houses, rentals, mobile homes and houses without telephones.

• Three-quarters of fatal fires and half of non-fatal fires happened in houses without smoke detectors.

Kerosene heaters often result in fires when people fill them outside during cold weather. When they bring them into a warm house, the kerosene expands, overflows and catches on fire on the floor.

In an accompanying editorial, Susan P. Baker of Johns Hopkins University said the development of cigarettes that go out when they are dropped and more use of sprinkler systems could both be important ways of preventing house fires.

"Smoke detectors alone give insufficient protection," she wrote, "partly because most people killed in house fires are very young, very old or incapacitated by alcohol and therefore may be unable to escape from a burning building."

Local Program educates teachers

By JOE O'CONNOR
Collegian Staff

Trying to make learning fun is no easy task. But that's what a local educational program, entitled "5C5E," is focused on — learning more about the world around us.

The acronym "5C5E" stands for the Five College and Education, Earth, Environment, Ecology and Energy Program and those enrolled as the pupils are local science teachers. The institute, sponsored by the National Science Foundation and located in Hasbrouck Hall, serves primarily science teachers from junior high and high schools in the area.

The availability of resources is one of the benefits of joining. An extensive library of learning aids is there, tailored for the age groups those teachers will be teaching.

These are used by the teachers so their students can be more active in doing research. Since the institute recognizes that public education has been hit hard by the economy, the program is doing its share to help out the academic community.

"I'm astonished by the success," said program administrator Mary Wilson in a telephone interview. "Research is the fun thing to do in those years; its the problem-solving that's enjoyable."

A staff of about twenty, including faculty from the University, the Five College Program and local public schools, manage four groups which hold lectures, seminars and question-and-answer discussions.

The four topics covered by the program are plants, atmosphere, energy and ecology.

On a deeper level, though, the program also seeks to introduce new views to its members, according to administrators. The seminars are geared to make teachers see their subjects in a new light, Wilson said.

A teacher should know they have the support of their fellow teachers and the administration behind them, Wilson said.

"They should know that its O.K. to run a little late, or get some equipment dirty, or even to get the kids dirty!" Wilson said.

In short, according to Ms. Wilson, it should be all right to have fun with science in the field.

Besides learning aids, there is a computer "bulletin board" system with 5C5E, or B.B.S. Gaining access to the system links you to an information network that serves over 1500 schools in the Pioneer Valley.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A mysterious stranger has recently appeared in your life. Become better acquainted before you make a major decision. Promote a business transaction that promises you a good profit.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Morning is the best time to gather the facts that you need. A quiet afternoon will help you make important decisions. Not only your interest, but your heart, may be captured today.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): The whole day appears to be yours to plan. Indulge in your favorite pastime. Quick thinking backed by undeniable talent should convince the most stubborn skeptic.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Something emerges to point the way to a clever financial solution. If you should come up with a new slant on things, keep your observations under wraps until the right moment.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): All signs indicate you are on the right track. Keep up the good work! Do not hesitate to call on your dear ones for help. Doing so will help to diffuse sibling rivalry.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): The air at work could be highly charged today. Proceed with caution. You may have to sacrifice or postpone certain career goals in order to pay more attention to offspring.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): If productivity rises, the resulting financial gains could help you discharge a pressing obligation. The closer two allies work together, the easier it will be to cope with difficult problems.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): An important issue may knock on your door. You might not know how to answer. Seek the counsel of experts. Your popularity soars like an eagle when you get out and mingle.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Hold on tight: when unexpected travel or communications snags loom, you must be razor sharp. A special event could offer both thrills and a small mystery.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A new ally has the charged-up energy you really admire a whole lot. Work, play or enjoy sports together. Cap the day off with an evening of at-home pleasures.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Your mood should be much brighter today, making it easier for you to find common ground with others. Start exploring and discussing an innovative idea.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Stick to the job at hand until the finishing touches have been applied and everyone is satisfied. Dismiss any second thoughts. Decisive action puts you in the driver's seat.

Field hockey remains unbeaten

Minutewomen dominate on the road, beat Providence

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The freight train known as the University of Massachusetts field hockey team (3-0) ran over another opponent in Providence Wednesday, this time defeating the Friars 1-0.

The field hockey team, whose slogan is "Roll UMass" is on another early season roll and took home the bragging rights of best team in New England by totally manhandling the Friars yesterday, who were ranked No. 1 in N.E. going into the game.

The UMass defense shut down Providence (2-1), allowing only four shots on goalie Philippa Scott while peppering 29 shots on Providence goalie Gina Martinello.

The Minutewomen broke the 0-0 deadlock 10 minutes into the second half, when Ainslee Press scored an unassisted goal on a penalty corner, which was the only offense UMass needed.

"The kids were absolutely fabulous today," an ecstatic coach Pam Hixon said. "I'm real proud of the team. This is the best we've played this year, if not the best I've ever seen."

The Minutewomen executed their game plan perfectly according to Hixon, shutting down the Friars' attack from the right side while mustering their own right side attack effectively.

"We totally controlled them to our left," said Hixon. "Then we played off that and were able to attack on our right."

Hixon said that while the score was kept low, UMass was never in danger of losing because Providence didn't have any good opportunities.

"We didn't allow them any penalty corners, which I was very happy of," she said. "Also, they didn't get one shot from inside the circle. Scottie only had to get down for one save."

Meanwhile, the Minutewomen bludgeoned Martinello throughout, moving the goalie all around the circle, according to Hixon.

The win was a boost for the Minutewomen, who were second in New England and No. 8 nationally going into the game but will no doubt move up next week. Hixon said the win puts the team in good shape in N.E., because there are only a few more teams to play.

Vincent gone?

Let's face it, folks, Major League Baseball is in tough shape.

As I write this column, there are no tears falling on my paper, because I am not nostalgic enough about the baseball I watched as a child. It has only been the last several years that I have become engrossed in the sport that seems to be falling apart at the very seams of the ball that is so much a part of a baseball fanatic's life.

The latest ugliness is the owner's vote of "no confidence" in, and subsequent resignation of, commissioner Fay Vincent. I can't help but feel sorry for Vincent. It was two years ago this past Sunday that he took over for his close friend A. Bartlett Giamatti. When Vincent took office, I don't think many people could have forseen the events that were to unfold: Pete Rose's Hall of Fame ballotting; Steve Howe's umpteenth drug offense; Ryne Sandberg's astronomical salary that will screw salaries up forever; and Vincent's own footnote to his tenure, the proposed realignment of the National League, which is being fought in court. The move, by the way, makes sense. Just don't ask the Cubs.

Kevin
HERLIHY

Why was Vincent, who seemed to actually be acting in that all important, "best interest of baseball" mode, dismissed?

Because MLB owners are bickering, self-centered bullies, interested only in their own bottom line, not at the overall benefit of our "national pastime."

If a team is not playing up to par by mid-season, the manager is often in the unemployment line. Now that the league as a whole is in question, one man must pay the price.

The three largest payrolls in MLB are, in no particular order, the Red Sox, da Mets and the Dodgers. As of yesterday the teams possessed a combined record of 188-244 and were a whopping 66 games out of first place. These three teams couldn't combine their best players to beat any of the division leaders in a series.

The quality of play seems to be down a bit this year, and it can only get worse with expansion looming. The hope is that expansion will make things more competitive. Existing teams will gladly give up aging sluggers and pitchers, but they will also have to part with the talented youth that scouts and general managers felt could produce down the line.

These general managers must hold their collective breath during the next few years and hope that a player left unprotected in the expansion draft doesn't hit a grand slam on the last day of the season to bury him and his team in last place.

With only a few weeks left in the season, what to we have to look forward to next season? A possible owner's lockout of the Player's Union, that's what. Thankfully, this possibility has been diminishing during the passing weeks.

Well, "national pastime," welcome to the 21st Century, where politics is king and integrity is no more. What an ugly trend you have set for other sports to follow.

dashed as a return meeting with UCLA resulted in an 11-1 loss.

"It was unbelievable," Sortino said. "I feel very lucky."

HONORS — • Sortino was named A-10 Coach of the Year.

• Aprile was named A-10 Pitcher of the Year, and was named to the World Series All-Tournament Team. In addition, she was named to the Third Team All-American squad and the All-New England Team. She was also named to the A-10 Academic All-Conference Team.

• Barbara Marean was named A-10 Player of the Year and was chosen to the Third Team All-American team and the All-New England Team. Her 16 triples are a national record. Her mid-season consecutive game hitting streak of 27 games was a national record at the time, but was broken by a UConn player later in the season.

• Sheri Kuchinskas was named to the A-10 All-Conference team and the All-New England Team.

• Peggy Bush was named to the A-10 All-Conference Team and the All-New England Team.

• Rachel Lawson was named to the A-10 All-Conference Team.

• Darlene Claffey was named to the A-10 Academic All-Conference Team.

The 10-0 record in the A-10 was the team's second straight undefeated league season, and the 39-13 record tied the 1991 team for the program's best record.

is to avoid Bright's misfortune. Padilla scored a 660 in his best SAT attempt, but he will have several more opportunities to better his mark by the necessary 40 points.

Nonetheless, the UMass hoops brass should hope he makes the cut, for Padilla is considered to have the skills to play either point guard or shooting guard, the sort of versatility all coaches relish.

Scott's shots

Lest we forget the most emotional day of the summer it's appropriate to observe a moment of silence in honor of #33.

Thank you.

• If only the Red Sox had picked up Jose Canseco there would be a serious pennant race now. Check that, if they had picked up the entire Oakland A's, they would be in contention.

Summer was stolen from us by the Sox. Going to Fenway was merely comic relief. Even a win meant nothing, it was just a chance to commiserate with other poor souls born into the BoSox legion.

• It's hard to say former Dean of Physical Education David Bischoff will be missed in these parts. You needed a decoder ring to figure out what the guy was actually talking about.

David
SCOTT

There's a need for new, energetic, youthful blood in the UMass athletic department and interim AD Glenn Wong is a good start. Not to mention the fact that the guy's got a phenomenal jumper.

• Is it too early to be counting the days until Midnight Madness? A quick reminder to Coach Cal that the Cravat King competition is just around the corner. Who will bring home this year's title of Top Tie Guy in the Valley? Check the byline up top for the safest bet.

• In northern California last Sunday the Bills and the 49ers were displaying football at its finest, while in southern Cali the Pats and the Shams had Vince Lombardi rolling over in his grave.

Don't lose faith in Mac's boys just yet. As a service to you, the reader, some colleagues and myself will venture to Foxboro on Sunday to witness the rebirth of football in New England. (There's always some good tailgate football games.) Full details forthcoming.

• The X-Man in Green. Sounds like a new Marvel comic book hero. Remember McDaniel in the green of Seattle? Celtics fans can only hope there's a correlation. By far the best part of the deal is that the Knicks got stiffed.

• While I'm still reeling from last year's false prediction of the Pats and the Cardinals in the Super Bowl, I'll persevere and once again and go with the Pats and Tampa Bay. After a midseason trade in which the Pats acquire Steve Young, Jerry Rice and Barry Sanders for Hugh Millen, Hart Lee Dykes and a video of Dick MacPherson's top ten hugs, the boys in red wind up 9-7, gain the wild card and the rest is. . . merely a dream.

• While women's soccer coach Jim Rudy rattles off quotes that would make Charles Barkley jealous, his ladies are off to a tremendous start in what could be a Final Four year.

• Name the three Red Sox players whose salary would more appropriately be spent on Hurricane Relief. Answer below.

• My dog Bo has found a new boxing opponent in the form of Montague's reigning middleweight champion, Ernie. Don King's press conference at The Montague Inn ended abruptly when Erratic Ernie stole Bruiser Bo's rawhide bone. Talk about incentive. Pay-per-view carries the fight Saturday night.

• (Here he goes again with the ridiculous Bo stories. The guy really must have nothing to write about.)

• Answer: Wade Boggs, Jack Clark and Matt Young.

• I might be reaching, but isn't Butch Hobson starting to resemble Joe Morgan? His quotes are Morganesque too. "He's a gamer," or "It was a big win."

• Do you think Hugh Millen knows it's okay to duck out of the pocket and throw on the run?

• Fay Vincent got shafted but just the notion that he would buy into the Red Sox makes you believe he might have been better suited for say, the UMass Athletic Department.

• Keep your feet in bounds and your eyes on the ball.

Softball finishes third in NCAA

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

While most students were studying their brains out during the seven-day period known as "Finals Week" last spring, the University of Massachusetts softball team was taking a different kind of final exam. Namely, the NCAA Softball World Series.

Not only did the Minutewomen (39-16) surprise the softball world by getting past the regionals, which were held here, they played to a 2-2 record in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, good enough for a national finish of third place.

It was the best post-season performance by a UMass team since the now-defunct women's lacrosse team won the national championship in 1982, and the first trip to the NCAAs for any UMass softball team.

"My lifelong goal, professionally, would be to stand on that field at the Hall of Fame Stadium, and to compete," said coach Elaine Sortino. "Not only to compete, but to have won, was unbelievable. It made such a great mark for the program."

After winning their fourth straight Atlantic 10 Championship and sixth in seven years, the Minutewomen lost to the University of Connecticut, 5-1, in the opening round of the NCAA Regionals. UMass had to win three straight to get to Oklahoma, and took a big step to that goal by beating the number six team in the country, Utah St., 1-0, behind a four-hitter by Darlene Claffey.

The game's lone run scored in the fifth, when UMass's Jen Salisbury made a backdoor slide to elude the tag of the Utah St. catcher.

"To think that all you needed to do is beat UConn twice," Sortino said of her team's regional rivals.

So what does UMass do to the team that had taken four-of-five from them previously?

They outscore the Huskies 10-0 in the first inning of the first game, and that is the way the ended. It was an NCAA Tournament record for runs in an inning.

Senior do-it-all Holly Aprile threw a three-hitter as the Minutewomen banged nine hits off UConn's ace, Kim Mizesko, whose record against UMass prior to the game was 3-0, with only one earned run allowed in 21 innings.

Follow it up the same day with a 3-0 win, behind yet another three-hitter by Aprile, and you had what Sortino called, "Absolutely the most outstanding moment for UMass softball. Certainly the thrill of a lifetime."

So it was off to Oklahoma, where UMass was the number eight seed in the eight-team field. Sortino said a strong UMass following of family and friends "drove all night" to the Series, to watch the Minutewomen play UCLA, the number one team in the country all season, in the Series' first game.

"I hate to say this," Sortino said, "but it was a wonderful feeling to be the underdog. We're expected to win around here. We're expected to win the A-10 Championship. We played with a tremendous amount of freedom, because we weren't afraid to lose."

UMass gave the Bruins a run for the money, as the game was scoreless until the fifth inning. Aprile walked a batter that eventually scored on a wild pitch, for the first run, and the game ended in a 4-0 loss.

Aprile threw a strong five-hitter, but it wasn't enough as UCLA's Lisa Fernandez stifled the UMass bats with a one-hitter.

Out of the loser's bracket again, to a battle with Florida St., the Series' number five seed and a 3-1 winner over the Minutewomen earlier in the season.

Aprile scattered nine hits in a 4-2 win, the first victory a northeast team had ever posted over a ranked southern team.

Long Beach St., the number four seed, was up next and UMass came up with a thrilling 2-1 victory in ten innings as a hustling Jen Salisbury scored on a single by Angyla Brumm.

Aprile pitched all ten innings, ending her pitching season at UMass with an 18-4 record.

The Cinderella story of the Series saw their dreams

Minutewomen respond in OT

Roberts nets game – winner in second extra session

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

In a game which took until overtime to get exciting and then went up and down like a rollercoaster, the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team finished on a high as it defeated the University of Washington yesterday, 2-1.

Freshman forward Nicole Roberts broke the 1-1 tie with only 3:04 left in the second overtime. From the right side Paula Wilkins crossed the ball to the front of the net where Roberts was able to head it into the upper left corner for the winner.

"I knew the goalie had come out and I saw the ball the whole way. I just wanted to get it up there and in the net," Roberts said of the game winning goal. "It was good serve by Paula."

Wilkins said, "I saw we had two players in front but I was being rushed. I just served it in so it would bend back away from the keeper. I was happy someone got to it."

No. 9 Massachusetts (4-0) had scored the games first goal ten minutes earlier when freshman Rachel LeDuc headed a Kim Eynard cross to the left of Husky keeper Tamara Browder and into the net.

"I knew I had the corner and I was just wondering if I would be pushed before the serve got to me," LeDuc said. "When it came I just flicked it to the corner and it got in."

The 17th-ranked Huskies would not cave in and responded with a goal two minutes later. Washington served a corner kick directly in front of the goal mouth. UMass keeper Skye Eddy leapt for the ball in a crowd but could only tip it up. When the ball came down Washington's Christine Keeley headed it into the open net to tie the game 1-1.

Both teams had a difficult time getting on track during regulation, part due to each others strong play and part due to the humid weather. In overtime each team had the chance to pack it in but UMass responded in the end.

JOSH REYNOLDS/ COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team needed an extra period to defeat Washington University Wednesday. The Minutewomen, ranked No. 9 in the country, won 2-1 in overtime.

Massachusetts coach Jim Rudy said, "It was nice to see us come back like that. I am not surprised though. This team is just getting together and finding its' spots. We missed some easy goals during regulation but in the end we got the goals we needed."

Wilkins added, "We had the composure to stay in the game. We were mature enough to not get too frustrated and we were able to put one in the back of the net. I give a lot of credit to our freshman for showing that type of maturity."

Springfield's Padilla commits to UMass hoop

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Staff

The arrivals of Lou Roe, Mike Williams, Jerome Malloy and Derek Kellogg made 1991-92 a banner year for basketball recruiting at the University of Massachusetts, and it seemed 1992-93 would yield a fine haul as well, until Donta Bright was deemed ineligible for scoring below 700 on the SAT exam. It's now up to Dana Dingle to provide freshman highlights for the Minutemen, though he certainly has the capacity for that task.

But 1993-94 might mark the incoming of more talented recruits — namely Edgar Padilla of Central High School (Springfield, MA), the school that produced Georgia Tech blue-chipper Travis Best.

Padilla has verbally committed to UMass for 1992-93. He won the John "Honey" Lahovich award last year as the best boys' basketball player in Western Massachusetts, following his junior year. Padilla has opted to stay in his native Puerto Rico instead of returning to Central for his senior year. He wants to stay in Puerto Rico in order to play basketball and lift weights year-round.

"I want to gain 15 to 20 pounds," the 163-pound Padilla told the Springfield Union-News.

Padilla's numbers at Central are eye-popping. The 6-foot-2-inch guard averaged 22.7 points, 8.0 assists and 8.5 steals per game, helping Central capture its fourth consecutive Western Massachusetts Division I title.

Padilla attended a basketball camp in Los Angeles this summer, but sustained a shoulder injury that he claims has now healed. His brother, 6-4 Giddel Padilla, will become eligible to play at UMass next semester. He scored 1,223 during his career at Central from 1986-90.

Following his graduation from Central, Giddel attended Wilbraham & Monson Academy and briefly the University of Nevada-Las Vegas, where he did not play basketball, despite rumors that have circulated on the UMass campus.

But Edgar Padilla will have to do some SAT prep if he

THIS WEEKEND
They Might Be Giants

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

"Glass of milk, standing in between extinction in the cold, and explosive radiating growth," sings They Might Be Giants on their latest album, Apollo 18. This particular set of lyrics explores the miracles of lactation in their song, "Mammals." This and more zany songwriting are what "Don't Tread on the Cut-up Snake World Tour 1992" is all about. It's coming to you Saturday September 19 at Amherst College.

An unbelievably quirky duo from Sudbury, Massachusetts, TMBG is a bizarre blend of wily rock with polka churning just below the surface. The two Johns of TMBG (Linnell and Flansburgh) have garnered the noteworthy title of Musical Spokespeople for International Space Year through an agreement with NASA. There cannot be a more appropriately spacey couple for the job in existence. By an act of Congress, 1992 has been dedicated to the celebration of Space as an international frontier.

Though it's hard to imagine experiencing more musical bliss than listening to Linnell on accordian and Flansburgh on guitar, this tour will feature for the first time ever an expanded lineup of guest musicians including Kurt Hoffman, founding member of New York City's the Ordinaires on sax and clarinet; Tony Maimone, bassist from the legendary Cleveland avant garde garbage band Pere Ubu and Jon Feinberg, on drums.

When asked to comment on playing with other musicians, guitarist John Flansburgh said, "At first we were reluctant to tour with a rhythm section, but then they said they'd help drive."

Rolling Stone describes TMBG's performance in LA as, "Plowing through crash and burn polka ditties and pop sing-a-longs capped off with heavy metal accordion riffing." Hard to pigeonhole, TMBG's work can be classified as alternative-rock-pop. Their latest album uses everything from recording vocals through a guitar fuzz-box to a Moog synthesizer to create their unique effect on the human mind.

In fact here's a little mind-full from Apollo 18, "She's actual size, but she seems much bigger to me." Other album highlights include the song, "The Statue Got Me High," with the lyrics "And though I once preferred a human being's company, they pale before the monolith that towers over me." In fact the album's only drawback is the excessive use of tamborine which jangles incessantly, especially in this song.

"If I Wasn't Shy" is the epitome of those cassettes you used to get when you were little. (The example screaming in my mind is the song my Mom used to play at my birthday parties, "Happy Birthday Lisa from Captain Zoom.") On the up-side I don't think any of these songs will offend Tipper Gore and her PMRC friends.

According to their label, Elektra, Apollo 18 is one of the first CD's to take full advantage of the shuffle mode found on today's CD players. "The song 'Fingertips' is composed of a series of 21 separate refrains, and in shuffle mode the CD player mixes up songs and 'Fingertips' 21 refrains at random, producing an ever-changing musical collage."

John Linnell explains the band's name, "It's the name of a movie made in the early seventies. We wanted a name that was outward looking and paranoid."

TMBG will perform Saturday September 19 at 9 p.m. in the Amherst College Campus Center Frontroom.

New student film premieres

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

"I want people to come out of my movie with the feeling that Christians are people, too; that we screw up. I want people to realize that Christianity has a message relevant to how we live in 1992."

Twenty-one year old former English exchange student Stuart Hazeldine is speaking of his second film, a stirring morality play called The Crossing. He wrote, directed, photographed, edited and produced this video film made last Spring semester on UMass, Amherst and Mount Holyoke college campuses.

The Crossing tells the story of four friends at UMass who struggle with choosing their moral identity and the consequences they all must face. Eighteen year-oid Communications major Kurt Mattila (who aiso composed an original score and designed the lighting and sound) turns in a mesmerizing performance as Mark Roberts, a student who tries to keep the faith of his Christian ideals in a climate of primarily non-believers. His beliefs eventually land him in a climactic philosophical debate with a classmate over whether Jesus was the son of God.

His roommate, Tim (Corey Pearlstien) and friends Mike (Zachary Schlappi) and Scott (Brian Cohen) take a different route. Concerned more with getting rich and making contacts, they decide to try to gain admittance to a fictional fratemity-like organization called The Empire Society, based underground at Amherst College. The group, which models itself after the hierarchy of ancient Rome, is super-exclusive and very secret.

While Tim and Mike get accepted and face initiation at The Empire Society, Scott is rejected and is left somewhere in the middle, searching for his own value system.

It is both the shocking practices of The Empire Society and the search for truth that propel The Crossing to its thoughtful ending which, instead of preaching morality, leaves the viewer to make up his or her mind.

Like the principal actors, the supporting cast played by Robert Corddry, Steven Casco, Stanton Denman and Amee Gray are all UMass students. Special mention goes to both Corddry and Casco, who gave impressively sadistic performances as The Empire Society's leaders.

Hazeldine started the project in the fail of 1991 with the script and spent most of November and December scouting locations and scheduling rehearsals. By January of this year, he had a camera on loan from Amherst Cable TV and spent the next four months filming for about three days a week from eight a.m. until 6 p.m.

He spent over 250 hours this summer editing at ACTV and up until last week was scoring the film and assembling the title and closing credits with the help of Kurt Mattila. But, according to Hazeidine, the hard work was all worth it.

Hazeldine, who will return to England to finish up his academics at the University of Kent at Cantebury, plans to return to America to attend film school at either NYU or UCLA. The filmmaker, who cites directors Ridley Scott, Oliver Stone and Spike Lee among his influences, plans to make movies with more emotion than the current Hollywood fare. If The Crossing is any indication, he's well on his way.

The Crossing will be shown this evening at Herter Hall Room 231 at 7:15 and 9:30 p.m. Admission is free.

Views from the outside

By MARK K. ANDERSON
Collegian Correspondent

Dead-ends can sometimes be a good thing.

I was talking to the bar keeper at Geddy's Pub in Bar Harbor, Maine, and she showed a politician's skill in avoiding the question.

"He now lives in Washington state and even if you did manage to track him down, I doubt that he'd want to talk to a reporter," she conjectured.

Several months previously, I had read about the pub's founder, locally infamous for his eccentricities, and how he had once managed to travel the world on his credit card only to return home and declare personal bankruptcy. He never paid up. (Kids, don't try this at home.)

Here, I thought, is a man who needs to be heard.

Unfortunateiy, the bartender's word sounded about as encouraging as a Pat Buchanan speech sounds benign. So, shoulders sunk, I paid my tab and sauntered out of Geddy's. And I started walking.

After two blocks, though, that Geddy guy (whoever he is) could have won Nova Scotia in a senior's scrabble tournament and I still wouldn't have cared. I had found my story.

Parked in the heart of the tourist district, was a van on which the owner had pasted miscellaneous photos, articles and essays relating to John Lennon's assassination. Nothing if not off-the-wall weird. More important, his clippings approached a conclusion, albeit a rather moronic one which, if it were an Olympic athiete, would be disqualified for steroid counts that would make

There's nothing smelly about new Sneakers

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

There's nothing smelly about Sneakers, a nifty little comedy/thriller with style and a definite sense of humor. It's a funny and suspenseful (dare I say it) feel-good flick that doesn't tell you when to laugh and when to be scared. This is a sit back, relax and enjoy movie.

Sneakers boasts Robert Redford as Martin Bishop, head of a motley crew of hackers and computer whizzes who break into other people's businesses to test the security systems. Bishop has been on the run from the government ever since he and his friend Cosmo (Ben Kingsley) pulled one too many computer pranks during their college days. Bishop went out for a pizza at just the right time, leaving Cosmo to take all the heat. Now, he keeps a low cover with this band of misfits.

The group includes Dan Ackroyd as Mother, a conspiracy nut who somehow links the "fake" JFK assassination with the "fixed" expulsion of Pete Rose. David Strathaim plays a blind technical whiz who, while not reading the Braille edition of Playboy, uses his heightened sense of hearing to one-up his sighted counterparts.

River Phoenix takes a break from his intense roles to reteam with his former Little_Nikita co-star Sidney Poitier. Phoenix plays nerdy Carl while Poitier portrays an ex-CIA agent who is frequently the conscience of the group.

When two NSA agents approach Bishop and the gang to steal a little black box the Russians have and the US wants, in exchange for clearance of Bishop's record, he can't resist. But when the little black box proves more than little and people aren't what they seem, Sneakers hits high gear. The film becomes a benignly twisty thriller lightened by well-placed humor.

Sneakers is quite clever, but never in a smarmy way. This is reasssuring escapist fare. You know the good guys will win out at the end, but it doesn't matter. It's how they do it. The techno-wizardry stuff is the best part, adding some of the "wow-they-can-do-that?" charm that fueled WarGames. The ending is also very funny, inspiring cheers from the audience (when was the last time someone clapped at the end of a movie?).

Robert Redford recovers from his Havana flop to turn in an aloof, classy performance. You can't help but root for him to get back with his former flame (Dances With Wolves' Mary McDonnell), who always seems to find herself involved in the caper whether she wants to or not.

The other characters, however slight, look as though they are having a great time. David Strathaim just about steals the show. Phoenix has the twitches and the geekiness of his character almost down to a science. Both Poitier and Ackroyd coast through their roles with assured ease.

The only problem: Cosmo isn't much of a villain. Ben Kingsley, arguably one of our best actors (he won an Oscar for Ghandi), does a capable job even with a slicked back ponytail. The problem is that Cosmo is underwritten as a character and the final confrontation between Bishop and Cosmo borders on the mushy. But it really doesn't matter much, since Sneakers skimps on all the characters.

Sneakers won't win any awards for originality or otherwise, but it is an amiable comedy with just the right amount of suspense. Above all, Sneakers does what most movies try and fail to do: entertain.

Spotlight on musical myth Pete Fernandez

By CUTTER GARCIA
Collegian Correspondent

This week the Collegian's roving reporter taps Into UMass' world of of Music through the eyes (er, mouth) of Pete Fernandez.

CG: Give me all the "Need to Knows" about Pete Fernandez.
PF: I'm 21. I'm an English major. I'm a senior, and I live in Harvard, Massachusetts. I grew up in Sunny Vale, California but have been in Harvard for the last ten years.
CG: Tell me about your involvement with Music here at UMass.
PF: Most of my musical affiliation here at UMass has been with the Theatre Guild, a student group which does plays and musicals on campus. I was in Evita, the orchestra pit for A Chorus Line. I was the musical director and co-creator of School House Rock, I was in the pit for Sweet Charity, I was rehearsal pianist and in the pit for Into The Woods and I was the pianist for Ten Little Indians. This semester I'm the musical director for Hair and I'll be writing and composing music for A Midsummer Night's Dream. Apart from the Theatre Guild, I've been in the Jazz ensemble, a small five-piece jazz band, and I'm also going to be in the vocal Jazz ensemble this year.
CG: How did you get your start?
PF: I took piano lessons when I was five but I quit because I hated to practice. Then I took trombone until the seventh grade and quit because the teacher was a complete witch. She didn't motivate anybody and just basically scared everybody out of wanting to be in a band.
CG:AH! Music through intimidation. . . a junior high school staple.
PF: (laughing) Yes! I'd always been interested in synthesizers and the cool stuff they could do so when I was a freshman in high school I bought myself a cheesy little Casio and started noodling around with that. They had played an album in my seventh grade music class called Oxygene by Jean-Michel Jarre and that was what really got me hooked on synthesizers.
CG: Any other influences?
PF: When I first started to play I was into art-rock, Genesis and Rush. Then in high school I started listening to Pink Floyd. Nowadays I've been trying to branch out because I worry about being close-minded to different forms of music. I've been listening to a lot of musicals. I'm really hooked on Stephen Sondheim. That and a lot of Jazz. I like Dave Brubeck a lot and I'm a devout Frank Zappa fan. He's just amazing. He's a genius.
CG: Tell me about what you'll be doing for Midsummer Night's Dream.

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Pete Fernandez

PF: That's going to be interesting. I'm supposed to be composing original music for that and playing it during the show's run on some synthesizers and a piano. I think the way I'm going to write that is going to be very spur of the moment. I'll show up at rehearsals and we'll decide what scenes need music and I'll go from there.
CG: So basically, Pete Fernandez is scoring Shakespeare.
PF: Yeah.
CG: How long of a process is it from thought to finished song?
PF: The idea usually comes when I'm sitting at the piano. I'll get a lyric or a song idea and expand on it. I try to flush something out right then but I'm usually not happy with it so I let it sit for a week or two and then go back to it. Usually, with luck, I can flush it out then.
CG: Tell me about Pete Fernandez's dream job.
PF: I would like to model the careers of two people, either Frank Zappa or Paul Schaeffer. Zappa has it made. He can write anything he wants while avoiding all the industry bullshit — and still sell out every concert. And Paul Schaeffer because he has the coolest job in the world, a steady gig every night and he gets to hang out with David Letterman and jam.
CG: Where do you see yourself in 5 years?
PF: Probably working in a laundromat and weeping because I can't get anything recorded (laughter). Actually I want to go to grad school at Berkeley and if I'm not done by then I'll be working and trying to get my foot in the door.
CG: If we peeked into your CD collection what would we find?
PF: Zappa, Brubeck, Living Colour, Pink Floyd, Vladimir Horovitz, Vince Biraldi-the guy who scored all the Peanuts specials in the 60s and a lot of musicals. Musicals have come a long way from the A Chorus Line format. They're more intense now. More dramatic form and less showy sequins.
CG: Are you working on anything now? Do you have a "closet musical" of your own?
PF: Yeah,I've been wanting to write a science fiction musical. I know that sounds cheesy. . .
CG: Issac Assimov meets Tommy Tune?
PF: (pausing as he reflects on the idea-then laughter) Oh, barf! Oh God — no! You've just ruined it. You've killed it. It's dead. 6 feet under. You're right, it sounds stupid (more laughter).

PF: I was thinking more along the lines of the Freedom Space Station they've been talking about lately. It was an intriguing thought to me — "What if a colony went up there and some real bad shit happened on earth and they were stranded there?"
CG: What kind of power do you feel music has?
PF: Music is a great form of communication. Using music to tell a story or get a certain point across is very important. I'm not saying that I have any huge, beautiful thing to say — but it's a great way to express yourself. Jeff Holmes, a big band, went to the Soviet Union and they played with these people who didn't speak any English but they (the band) could shout, "Duke Ellington — Take the A Train" and they'd all know the song. They hopped right into it and jammed and by the end of that one song they're all best friends. It's amazing. It's kind of cheesy to say, but music could unite the whole world.
CG: You act, draw, sing and compose, if tomorrow you could only keep one of those talents which would it be?
PF: Music. I love that more than anything else.

Schwarzenegger blush.

The basic premise this self-appointed expert put forth was that the man who really snuffed the life of Yoko's favorite Beatle was none other than Maine's second largest export, Stephen King.

As far as I could tell, Mark Chapman (the man who actually assassinated Lennon) was press bait for the Bangor horror novelist's dastardly Beatle cleansing designs. Of course, like any good conspiracy, the C.I.A. and recent Republican administrations were in on the take too.

Mr. King's motivations or even means for the deed appeared irrelevant to the van owner. The proof lies in the uncanny resemblance between alleged assassin and supposedly innocent non-suspect. Oh yeah, and the van man included some clever cryptology with a Time magazine letter column too.

Somebody put this guy in tough with Oliver Stone. (or wait. Maybe he IS Oliver Stone. . .)

So anyway, always being one to head for the center of the action, I dashed to Bangor before you could say "Geraldo."

"Steve," a sobriquet which Bangor residents seem all too eager to use, "has tolerated this nutcase for the whole summer," confided a Bangor bookseller and not - so- reserved King fanatic himself. "Quite frankly, " he continued, "Were it not for the fact that Steve came on the local radio stations telling us to let this guy be, he'd probably be in the river by now."

Say what, Chester?

I didn't know which to be more horrified by: some goof ball purveying his hyper-paranoid conspiracy theories or the fact that Stephen King seems to have the whole town of Bangor in a manic state of blind obedience.

As if to further my suspicions, the lunch counter attendant shot the most icy, frightened glance when I mentioned my motivation for visiting Bangor.

At that moment Rod Serling managed to crawl out from under a nearby salad bar and, after wiping the stray coleslaw off his lapel, began tonight's epilogue about a green young writer who, not knowing his limits, had learned too much.

Sports dept. probe calls for tighter regs

By TAMI MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

In the wake of allegations the Athletic Department and the School of Physical Education grossly misused University funds, Provost Glen Gordon called for the strengthening of campus travel policies and an effort to educate the public on the importance of legitimate travel expenditures.

Gordon made his recommendations in a report he presented to the Faculty Senate yesterday. Chancellor Richard O'Brien asked Gordon to write the report shortly after the scandal surfaced in June.

"The campus should publicly reaffirm its support for professional travel for faculty and staff; it should also explain to the public why such expenditures are important to the institution," the report said.

"Of course, all these activities must be legitimate, comply fully with campus procedures, and must avoid extravagance and waste.

In his investigation, Gordon submitted written questions to David Bischoff, retired dean of the School of Physical Education, Frank McInerney, retired athletic director, Frank Katch, professor of exercise science and former chair of that department and Elaine Sorentino, associate athletic director and softball coach.

Bischoff and Katch's responses were not sufficiently detailed to draw conclusions from and Gordon is consulting with legal counsel concerning the next steps to be taken, according to the report.

Gordon concluded, however, that meetings attended by McInerey and Sorentino "were appropriate, all travel forms were completed, and their expenses not exorbitant."

"Their responses provided me with sufficient evidence to conclude that neither McInerney nor Sortino did anything improper with respect to travel, and that neither individual violated campus procedures or state laws," Gordon said.

Gordon stressed the need for the University to tighten its regulation of travel expenses.

"The campus should strengthen its travel policies and procedures by clearly establishing approval protocols for all travelers," the report said.

The report reads, "every trip at every level should be verified as to budget and purpose. At present, campus procedures do not call for supervisor's approval at the dean's level and above."

South Africa may let Blacks in government

By TINA SUSMAN
Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — President F.W. de Klerk promised to introduce legislation next month allowing Blacks in government for the first time.

De Klerk also repeated promises that all South Africans, including the Black majority, would vote in the next general election, scheduled for 1994.

In a speech Wednesday night to the Pretoria Press Club, de Klerk also said parliament will discuss the future of the nominally independent black homelands such as Ciskei, where security forces shot to death 28 ANC supporters earlier this month.

Burials were planned Friday for the victims. The African National Congress said it expected tens of thousands of supporters to attend memorial services scheduled for tonight in King Williams Town, just across the border from the Ciskei capital, Bisho.

The Sept. 7 shootings plunged ANC-government relations to their lowest level since more than 40 Blacks were massacred in Boipatong township in June and the ANC halted political negotiations with the government. De Klerk has urged the ANC to return to talks, and his speech Wednesday was another attempt at reconciliation.

While the president previously has promised to permit Blacks in government by the time his term ends in 1994, the speech gave details on how such changes will be introduced to amend the constitution so anyone, "irrespective of race or color," can be a Cabinet minister, de Klerk said.

Whites, Indians and colored or mixed-race people are now represented in separate chambers in parliament, but Blacks do not have the vote or representation.

The October session will last less than a week and deal only with issues to prepare the country for a transition from the White-minority rule to multiracial democracy. Parliament will convene again for its regular annual session early next year.

Ex-House Post Office chief admits to embezzlement

By LARRY MARGASAK
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The highest-ranking official to be indicted in the House Post Office scandal pleaded guilty Thursday in a criminal investigation that could target members of Congress and their campaigns.

Former post office chief of staff Joanna G. O'Rourke admitted two misdemeanors: embezzlement of of government property and misuse of government funds by a public officer.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Wendy Wysong told U.S. District Judge Norma Holloway Johnson that the government would have proved at trial that Ms. O'Rourke conspired to "cash large campaign and personal checks."

The prosecutor's statement made clear that the investigation is looking at possible illegalities in cashing campaign checks at the House Post Office.

A federal grand jury indictment was less specific, saying she conspired with others, who were not identified, to "perform personal and campaign services" for House

Iran-Contra inquiry ends; 3 prosecutions to proceed

WASHINGTON — Iran-Contra prosecutor Lawrence Walsh announced today he is ending his 5 1/2 year criminal investigation into the scandal and will seek no further indictments "in the absence of no new developments."

"We do not expect to present any further matters to the grand jury," Walsh wrote to the federal appeals court that appointed him.

"My office has completed its active investigation into Iran-Contra matters," Walsh said in his letter to Judge George MacKinnon, who presides over a special appeals court that appoints independent counsels.

Walsh said his office will proceed with the prosecutions of former Defense Secretary Casper Weinberger, former CIA spy chief Clair George

Domestic violence in the rubble

By RICHARD COLE
Associated Press

CUTLER RIDGE, Fla. — A special domestic court and a safe house for battered women opened Thursday in hurricane-striken south of Dade County to deal with a wave of increasingly violent abuse cases.

"I had a woman yesterday with a chunk taken out of her shoulder by by a machete," acting Circuit Judge Linda Dakis said as she walked down a hallway looking for an empty room to hold court.

"Machetes seem to be the thing these days."

Emergency injunctions to protect victims have doubled since Hurricane Andrew swept through the region on Aug. 24, 24 while available police officers have almost vanished, she said.

The county complex housing the new domestic court emerged relatively unscathed compared to the surrounding devastation of Cutler Ridge. That attracted the Army, which commandeered part of it as a headquarters for troops helping to rebuild the neighborhood.

Soldiers in fatigues strolled the corridors past the first group of nervous women to use the domestic court. One young wife speaks softly to an attorney, briefly flashing a smile that shows a gap where her husband punched out her front tooth.

Fists and machetes are not the only weapons of choice, said Leonel Mesa, a domestic violence counselor. Knives, bats or just about anything lying around are being used, he said.

Most of the cases involve men with a history of family violence, often coupled with drinking. In Andrew's wake, the cases are all showing up at the same time, Mesa noted.

The violence is also directed against children. Newly homeless fathers and boyfriends react violently.

"Now the women are more dependent on their husbands, especially economically," he said. "The house is devastated, their defenses are low, they feel that regardless of the past, they have to rebuild."

Before Andrew, the domestic courts dealt with 35 to 40 emergency cases a day.

"Now we're in the 70s," Judge Dakis said.

One bright spot is the tent cities. The presence of troops, plus a ban on alcohol, have made domestic violence rare, she said.

Husband, wife team up in space

By SUSAN HIGHTOWER
Associated Press

SPACE CENTER, Houston — The first married couple to fly together in space has spent little time together aboard Endeavour — just a "wave as we pass in the tunnel going to work each day," astronaut Jan Davis said today.

Davis and payload commander Mark lee are married, but assigned to work opposite 12-hour shifts inside the Spacelab research module. At a news conference this morning, the couple said the only time they've shared is the 15-minute handover between shifts. They married in January 1991, more than a year after being assigned to the mission. NASA made an exception to its policy barring husbands and wives from flying in space together since the pair had invested so much time training.

"We don't see much of each other .. but nevertheless, we're still sharing this flight, and I've thoroughly enjoyed it," Davis said.

"We just kind of wave as we pass in the tunnel going to work each day," she said, referring to the passage that links the Spacelab module in the payload bay to Endeavour's middeck.

Mamoru Mohri, the first professional Japanese astronaut, said crew members generally have adapted to each other's cultures, but pilot Curtis Brown, Jr. disliked his gift of an "ameboshi," a salty pickled plum considered a Japanese staple.

The crew news conference followed two interviews this morning with astronaut Mae Jemison, the first black woman in space. She praised the views of Earth from Endeavour.

"We've passed over the world several different times of course now, we've looked at the continents pass by, and that has been spectacular," she said.

Attitash introduces 'pay-as-you-ski'

BARTLETT, N.H. (AP) — Attitash Ski Area will be the first in the East to offer pay-as-you-ski lift tickets.

The innovation, called a Smart Ticket and already available in Montana and Oregon, was introduced Thursday at a news conference in Cambridge.

Attitash officials say it gives consumers more options, and could save them money.

The plan allows a skier to buy one of four tickets with varying point values. Each time a skier gets on a lift, he or she inserts the ticket to pass through a turnstile. Points automatically are deducted each time the skier gets on a lift.

Traditional day-long tickets still will be available, said Attitash spokesman Ben Wilcox.

"A traditional lift ticket still is the better value if you're going to ski from sun up to sun down," he said.

But he said with Smart Ticket, skiers have the option to leave early if inclement weather arises, they become tired or they want to pursue another activity, such as shopping.

The ticket can be used by more than one skier, and is good for two years from the date of purchase. They are available in four sizes: $18 (75 points), $33 (150 points), $65 (300 points), and $96 (450 points).

Lifts have values ranging from 5 points for the beginner trail to 20 for the top-notch expert trail. Some point values are reduced during weekdays.

"Who wants to leave money - or a day lift pass that didn't get a good workout - on the table?" Attitash President Phil Gravink said.

"It's a way to get people out and give them more options," added Wilcox.

Attitash, which has 28 slopes, suffered a slight decrease in skier visits last year.

Panel: Earth Summit no 'Greenpeace love-in'

By THOMAS A. GEORGE
Collegian Correspondent

Local educators gave an enthusiastic report on the June Rio Earth Summit and Global Forum Wednesday, concurring that it was no "Greenpeace love-in."

Hampshire College President Gregory Prince and University of Massachusetts Professor Peter Haas attended the international Earth Summit and offered their appraisal of the summit to a Hampshire College audience.

The Global Forum, which was held at the same time of the Earth Summit, was a conference of non-government organizations committed to the protection of the environment and the enhancement of global living standards.

Both panelists had positive remarks about the success of the Global Forum as an avenue for international networking and the consolidation of independent efforts by private environmental action groups.

"The three main issues that were approached at the summit was consumption in the North, the need for growth in the south and global population growth," said Prince.

He also stressed that the population issue has been embroiled in controversy.

In the eyes of the third world, "the population issue is one easy solution for a hard problem," said Prince. "The population issue is one of avoidance, and is too pointed at the south."

When asked about the United States delegation to the Rio Earth Summit, Prince said: "I think that the individuals were making the most of a bad situation."

He also felt that the Bush Administration blew a fine opportunity for futhering policies that are part of Bush's plan. "The (U.S.) government miscalculated what the summit was to be about, it was not going to be a GreenPeace love-in."

Professor Haas also commented on the U.S. delegation.

"The hardline U.S. position made a scapegoat for the European delegation that was able to refuse to make concessions that would have otherwise would not have been in the backlight," said Haas.

Professor Haas listed tangible results from the conference such as the publication of the "Twenty-Seven Principles On Sustainable Developement," and the "United Nations Agencies on Sustainable Developement."

In addition, the conference spurred the formation of three treaties: the Climate Change Treaty, the Biodiversity Treaty and the Forestry Principles Treaty.

"We need to appraise the ways Rio magnified pressure for global sustainable developement," Haas said.

There was talk at the Earth Summit for developing a set of reporting requirements on national activities for sustainable development, the panelists said.

In addition, the panelists also discussed the way in which the "Global Environmental Facility" is to be administered and how the United Nations system will be able to follow up the type of decisions that were made at the conference.

The program was sponsored by PAWSS, the Five College Program in Peace and World Security Studies.

PAWSS regularly holds seminars and panel discussions, and Wednesday night was the first of the new academic year. A third panelist, activist Lois Barber, was unable to attend.

Eating disorders a real worry among students

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

"We've seen the vomit in the trash can and we don't know what to do. We're real worried."

According to Robin Levine, a nutritionist from University Health Services, this is one of an increasing number of phone calls received from concerned friends, roommates, boyfriends and residential assistants.

Levine said a rising number of students have been calling seeking help, concerned a friend has a disorder or convinced they have one. The caller sometimes claims the person refuses to get help, leaving them not knowing what to do.

"They're very concerned about safety and health," said Levine. "If you talk to almost anyone in the dorm they know someone in the situation."

Reacting to the increased number of phone calls, Health Services is sponsoring a workshop specifically for the friends of someone with a disorder. "Understanding Eating Disorders: Strategies for Families and Friends with Eating Disorders" will be held at the end of October.

"We want to be able to help out," said Levine.

The calls have increased in steady numbers according to Levine. She found it "pretty unusual" that two people have come in the first day of school already.

Levine said a caller will typically describe a friend not eating, always talking about their weight and not feeling comfortable with their looks. Callers also have noted that the person always exercises.

"They smell the vomit in the bathroom, their food disappears — it really affects the person close to the person with a disorder," said Levine. "It affects their whole living situation."

Levine said the biggest problem is that people feel worried or helpless.

"They feel like they can't get on with their life," said Levine.

Levine found it common for the student population to be concerned with their physical appearance and speculated that peer pressure and competition "bring out" eating disorders.

Coming to a new school is a difficult transition, Levine feels and said many come from abusive families who tend to not be available. She said this may be one cause.

Get your flicks, quick

Amherst firm brings movies to your door

By DAVID LAFONTANA
Collegian Correspondent

Amherst has tons of delivery services for pizza and calzones, but three entrepreneurs have a new twist on an old idea. Now you can have movies brought to you, too. A movie rental store, Quick Flix, has opened that delivers the movies.

The business was formed by John and Jamie Grasperini, two former UMass students, and David Ruby, an Art History/German major at UMass

Jamie thought of the idea five years ago while he was a business major here.

"He didn't have a car," his brother John said, "so he could not get to any video stores. He thought a delivery service for movies would be a great idea for students stuck on campus like him."

Jamie and his roomate started planning and almost started the business then."They were going to call it Sick Dick's Quick Flicks," John said, smiling, "we shortened the name a bit."

Six months ago the Grasperini's decided to give the business a try again. Ruby, a high school friend, became a business partner, and the three opened the store three weeks ago.

Prices start at $2.95 and the store rents new releases and adult movies.

Ruby is happy with the way things were going,

"They were going to call it Sick Dick's Quick Flicks. We shortened the name a bit."

John Grasperini

"Business has been picking up as more people find out about us."

He also recommended calling in the early afternoon to make sure you got the movies you wanted later in the evening.

John seemed pleased, and said they would need more advertising.

"We had put an ad in the Advocate but they called us Quick Fix," John said. "That wasn't quite what we had in mind".

AHORA seeking to unite community

By SEEMA MALHOTRA
Collegian Correspondent

AHORA, a Spanish speaking organization dedicated to the University's Latin American community, kicked off its fall semester Wednesday with an opening meeting attended by a crowd of over 80 students.

The introductory gathering featured discussions and a video — all conducted entirely in Spanish.

According to AHORA Vice President Ileana Ramos, the 18-year-old organization hopes to reach out to the University's entire Spanish speaking population.

"We are a very large community of Spanish speakers in the University and we tend not to reach out to everyone. We hope that through Ahora we can get more people involved," she said. "We hope to unite our brothers and sisters in one group where everyone takes part in bettering their community, culture and gets to know people from other countries."

AHORA President Jalil Mendoza said she hopes the group can represent a united voice for the community.

Winners & losers unite

Republicans, Dems hold luncheon

By EVE EPSTEIN

BOSTON — Republicans and Democrats attempted to put the primary behind them Thursday and look ahead to the November election by presenting old rivals as united.

Republicans brought winners and losers together for a formal luncheon at the Park Plaza Hotel in Boston, and Democrats held their unity event at the Josiah Quincy School in downtown Boston.

Several democratic losers were notably absent, including U.S. Rep. Chester Atkins, state Sen. Paul Harold, D-Quincy and state Rep. Barbara Hildt, D-Amesbury.

Atkins, who lost to former assistant district attorney Martin Meehan, was with his family, according to an aide, Mark Provost.

"He plans to spend a few more days with his family and then get back to work," Provost said.

Harold lost to incumbent Rep. Gerry Studds in the 10th Congressional District race. Hildt fell just short of enough votes to oust embattled Rep. Nicholas Mavroules in the 6th Congresional District, who faces federal charges of extortion.

Meehan and Rep. Joseph Kennedy were the only two congressional candidates to show up at the school, along with Mayor Raymond Flynn, House Speaker Charles Flaherty, D-Cambridge, and winners and losers from the legislative primaries.

Kennedy pointed out that many of the incumbent congressmen headed back to Washington to vote on a key measure to control cable television costs.

Democrats made it clear they are going to hitch their campaigns to presidential candidate Bill CLinton, by trying to convince voters they can help Clinton bring change to Washington.

"We're going to have a Democratic Congress to work with a new administration and repower this economy," Meehan said.

Harold said he did not know about the Boston event, but that he plans to support the Studds against Republican Dan Daly.

"We're going to put together a meeting next week of our core supporters and see how we can best integrate our campaign organizations," Harold said.

Upward Bound scandal should not be tolerated

It seems as if we have a "Watergate" on our hands.

As I stated in my last editorial about the Upward Bound program, a college preparatory program for first generation high school, college and low income students, the University administration kept information about the program being defunded a secret from the University community. The letter from the Department of Education was dated May 8, 1992, but the information was not promulgated until May 27, after school was dismissed.

Malkes
GOMES

In fact, on May 15 the Upward Bound staff requested a meeting with Dr. Gloria deGuevara, associate dean of Academic Support Services, which oversaw the program, to inquire about the status of the grant proposal to renew the program for another three year cycle. Five days later the staff was notified that she would not be able to meet with them. Seven days later the staff was told their services would no longer be needed.

The letter stating the program was defunded was addressed to Lee Beatty, director of the Office of Grants and Contracts at the University and was carbon copied to Doctor deGuevara, who claims to have had no knowledge of the letter. In fact, the fiscal administrator of the Office of Grants and Contracts stated to one of the Upward Bound employees that as soon as the letter arrived, it was faxed to Dr. deGuevara. As far as I know, withholding mail, and mail with such important information, is a federal offense punishable by imprisonment and or a fine. At this time there are also funds which have not been accounted for by the department of Academic Support Services.

Salaries for the positions of the director, secretary and one case worker — all vacant for over a year — need to be accounted for, as well as the 3 to 5 percent increase in employees' pay which was never given. The University is being sued by a former employee for withholding this increase.

In the spring of 1990, Upward Bound employees found that $14,000 worth of computer equipment donated by the psychology department was picked up by someone named Joseph Gordon, who at the time was director of the program. The computers never arrived at the Upward Bound office in the New Africa House.

It was also discovered that purchase orders from the Upward Bound program were used to pay for rooms in the Campus Center Hotel, as well as for outings at the University Faculty Club for functions not associated with the program. Tampering with federal funds is punishable by imprisonment.

The information from a 1982 grant proposal was used to write the last proposal. That the people involved in writing this grant from the Office of Academic Support Services would even think of using 9-year-old information on a grant proposal shows a definite lack of knowledge on their part. It does not display resourcefulness, especially since the Office of Institutional Research and Planning is housed at the University. It is beyond me why anyone with a Ph.D. would execute such thoughtlessness.The avenue used was one which does not encompass the creativity of a person holding a Ph.D. You may not be able to perceive why the proposal was not passed. You may also ask: was this a conspiracy?

The community should be outraged that information was held from us. We pay tuition and the administration used it to pay part of the cost for the Upward Bound program. Therefore we have the right to know about all missing funds and to demand the Upward Bound program be returned.

If we let the administration slide, it will only happen again. We should not tolerate such scandals like this. There are some definite ethical questions involved in this and we shall discuss this next time.

Column on officer inappropriate

I am writing in response to an editorial submitted by Evelyn De Jesus regarding the UMass police officer who supposedly "chased and harassed" her on Sunday [Collegian Sept. 15].

What was the point to Ms. De Jesus' article? It seems there was no point except to publicly embarrass a vividly described officer who was clearly trying to be friendly to a young woman who seemed to be having a rough day.

Secondly, I would like to criticize Ms. De Jesus for being a narrow-minded hypocrite. After jumping all over the officer for using words that she felt were inappropriate, she turned around and scrawled an article accusing the officer of "chasing and harassing" her. For someone who would like to appear outwardly concerned about the dialect one human being uses toward another, Ms. De Jesus wasn't too careful in choosing the wording of her attack on the officer. Had the officer actually "chased and harassed" her, I feel certain further action would have been taken. A report would have taken less time to file than her article did to write and would have been much more effective.

Ms. De Jesus, If you really wanted to get an article published in the Collegian, couldn't you have come up with a more worthwhile subject to write on than one that would bring an innocent police officer trying to be friendly into ill repute?

I was having a good summer. It was hot. I was working for my father and drinking a lot. I drank almost every night with Murph the Surf and Shameful Ray. We'd drive around in my car. I'd drive to the Cape and visit a girl there. Things were refreshingly mundane.

Chris J.
PETROPOULOS

The only thing I didn't worry about was what UMass was doing out here behind the hills and under the trees. I knew it was still there. Sometimes at night my teeth would hurt and there would be a tiny earthquake. I knew it was UMass, rolling over on its bed of leaves, scratching it's ass, or farting. So I didn't worry about it. I let down my guard, so I guess I got what I deserved.

UMass sent me a letter. It said that I had not reserved my room at the end of the last semester. This was true. At the time, I wasn't sure if I was coming back. When I got the letter, I was sure. The letter said, "Call UMass right away if you still want a room." I called UMass.

"Hi, UMass. This is Petropoulos, number three eleven six six zero eight. I don't need no stinking badge."

"What?"

"Never mind. I got your letter. I need a room, preferably mine."

"Great, what number are you again? We can probably put you at least back on your floor. Give me all your information, send us a few thousand dollars and everything will be just fine."

Later, I felt good. I would have a room, probably on the seventh floor in Orchard Hill. The view there is good, it looks north, away from UMass. Weeks went by. I had other things to worry about. The girl on the Cape had green eyes that scared me. I killed someone's golden retriever one night on 202, really a messy thing, and I was sure they would be looking for me. I had a smashed headlight. I was marked.

I kept drinking with Shameful Ray and Murph the Surf. Shameful Ray was nervous about going back to Texas because his head always explodes when he's in Texas. We watched Mystery Science Theater 3000 and played John Madden football at his house. He drank a liter straight from the bottle. He drank a liter every day.

Anyway, the day after he left I got very nervous myself. UMass had not sent me a room assignment. I had sent them my parents' money. I called UMass. "Hi, UMass. This is Petropoulos, number three eleven six six zero eight. Who is John Galt?"

"What?"

"Never mind. I called five weeks ago. I sent you money. What room should I move into?"

"What year are you?"

"I suppose I am a junior."

"Oh. . . well. Whomever you spoke to before must have made a mistake. Juniors and seniors should come to housing on Sept. 10 and they can choose from whatever is left."

I was angry and nauseous all at once. "Do you have my money?"

Yes, they had it. "Did your employee make an error?" Yes, he did. "Should I have to alter my plans and get a shitty room in Southwest because of your error?" Yes, I should.

That sucks.

Anyway, I hung up the phone and started drinking scotch whiskey. Murph went to D.C. for a while, Ray called from Texas and said he was OK, and the green-eyed girl stopped returning my calls.

I drank a lot of scotch whiskey.

Homosexuality is about emotional fulfillment

Michael, dear, you're so cute. . . My only hope is that no one takes you seriously. It would be a shame if all the impressionable young freshmen whose minds we're trying so desperately to mold into broad, open ones actually listened to your silly drivel (Collegian, Sept. 14].

You don't speak for "the world." Contrary to what you seem to believe, the reason gays and bisexuals are blatant about their sexuality is not to annoy you.

It's to open people's minds to the fact that WE EXIST, and thus gain acceptance.

You are wrong when you say that you don't care about people's sexual preferences, because gay sex obviously disgusts you. As a bisexual person, I can assure you that same-sex relationships are not based solely on sex, as you seem to believe.

But who are you to condemn a person as immoral because of the way he or she finds pleasure?

To say that sex is just for procreation is like saying eating should just for nutrition. Then by your definition, would you say ice cream is immoral?

You say you don't want to "kill all gays," but it sounds to me like you'd rather they shut themselves into closets and withdrew from society.

Think about this: if more men were gay, there would be less sexual harassment and fewer physical attacks on women.

More lesbians would mean fewer babies, unwanted or otherwise, which is a good thing considering the gross overpopulation in the world.

"Homosexuals have full control over their bodily functions and choose this immoral lifestyle." This is ludicrous! As I have said, being gay is not just about sex. It's about emotional fulfillment. I myself was molested as a child, which is why I feel more comfortable being physically and emotionally close to a woman than to a man.

I have no control over this. You will NOT tell me to sacrifice my chance to have a fulfilling relationship because you think I should be with a man.

Everybody has the right to be happy, to love and be loved. Why don't you worry instead about people that are full of hate? I think you know where to start. . .

Columnist's 'trash' unwanted by reader

Mr. Morrissey [Collegian, Sept. 14], what you seem to forget is that many researchers agree that roughly one in ten of all Americans are gay or lesbian. That shouldn't scare you. At least you can determine how many people you are actually discriminating against just by doing some simple math. Gays don't choose a "lifestyle" any more than you.

When you say that the number of gays is increasing, you are wrong. There are just as many people now who are gay than there have been throughout history. The difference now is that gays are realizing that there is no reason to be ashamed of who you are, no matter your skin color, no matter your gender, and no matter who you find sexually and romantically attractive. You are who you are, and God made you that way.

The next time you want to write bigoted trash, I suggest you think before you make a fool out of yourself again. I for one do not appreciate you contributing to the overabundance of prejudice and bigotry that we would all be better off without.

Fiddler on the Roof still making history

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Now that Fiddler on the Roof has won the 1991 Tony Award for Best Revival, it's arrived here at UMass to explore some "family values." Fiddler is opening the Fine Arts Center's 1992-1993 Dream Season, as part of a national tour produced by the Troika Organization in association with Music Theatre Associates.

A hit since its opening at the Imperial Theatre Sept. 22, 1964, Fiddler is the story of Tevye, a dairyman from a poverty ridden Jewish settlement in Russia, who has hired a matchmaker to find husbands for his five daughters.

The year is 1905, the eve of the Russian Revolutionary Period. He's surprised to learn that his children will begin traditions of their own. One daughter even runs off with a Christian soldier, so is disowned by the family. A pogrom and threats of increasing anti-Semitism finally force Tevye and his neighbors to leave Anatevka and seek homes in other countries.

According to Abe Laufe, author of Broadway's Greatest Musicals, "In the past, some theater-goers had complained that plays dealing with Jewish life were frequently meaningless to anyone unfamiliar with Orthodox Jewry. There were fewer objections to Fiddler on the Roof on this point, for Joseph Stein [author of the musical] in the opening scene explained many of the traditional costumes, such as the skull cap and the dangling prayer shawl, and several of the traditional customs.

"An awareness of the meanings and connotations of 'Fruma' and 'Yente' added a touch of humor to the names, but unfamiliarity with the double meanings did not detract from the enjoyment of the show," continues Laufe.

When Fiddler premiered, it was different than anything that had gone before it.

"But by the time Fiddler on the Roof had won numerous awards, become the longest running show in the history of theatre, and reaped a harvest of something over $30 million, somebody must finally have been convinced they had done something right," explains Arthur Jackson, author of The Best Musicals.

Fiddler is based on Shalom Aleichem's stories. According to Laufe, Stein altered a few aspects of Aleichem's original story when writing the musical. "[Stein] added new characters and included specific references to the oppression and violence that had not been emphasized so strongly in the original stories."

More of the complex Jewish heritage was captured by Jerome Robbins' choreography which ranged from traditional folk dances to vigorous Russian steps that sent dancers leaping and jumping in breathless routines.

Fiddler created some new history, by winning the New York Drama Critics' Circle Award for Best Musical of the Year in addition to winning Tony

A Runaway for Elton

Adam Scott Roberts reviews The One

By ADAM SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Correspondent

Elton John
The One
MCA

He said "Goodbye to the Yellow Brick Road," and he preached "Don't Let The Sun Go Down On Me". Now, he claims that all he ever needed was "The One."

The One is the title song and the name of the latest LP from Elton John. Nine of the 11 songs were recorded at Studio Guillaume Tell in Paris, France. And if that doesn't excite you, guess who came up with the album cover's concept? Designer Gianni Versace. And I thought the Diamonds and Pearls' cover was cool! NOT! The multi-colored liner notes include the words to all 11 songs.

And even better, John is sporting a new hair piece (maybe "he's also a client") in a Patrick Demarchelier photograph.

This album is nothing like last year's TWO ROOMS: Celebrating The Songs of Elton John and Bernie Taupin, which consists of 16 John/Taupin songs sung by such artists as George Michael, Oletta Adams, The Beach Boys, Wilson Philips, and other well known artists.

Instead, The One is the latest LP with 11 new songs, including a fantastic duet with singer Eric Clapton called "Runaway Train." "Runaway Train" is different from Elton John and George Michael's duet, "Don't Let the Sun Go Down on Me" for the reason that Clapton and John belt out the lyrics with more feeling as the rhythm picks up. In the second verse Clapton picks up the pace with, "Well we've wrapped ourselves in golden crowns/Like sun gods spitting rain/Found a way home written on his map/Led red dye in my veins." This track reminded me of John's classic "Rocket Man" from his Greatest Hits LP.

In "The North" Elton John sings about leaving his mother: "The North was my mother/But I no longer need her/You trade your roots and your dust/For a face in the river/And a driven rain that washes you/to a different shore/There's a North in us all/But my North can't hold me anymore." "The North" is about every man's first love, his mother.

The album also contains other songs about more recent women in John's life such as, "When a Woman Doesn't Want You," "Understanding Woman", and "Emily." "Emily" sounds like John's "Candle in the Wind," because of the piano notes John plays. All three songs sound as if they are coming from the 1970's Elton John.

The One is what I call a "feel good album." Did you actually expect anything different from the Diet Coke commercial star? This isn't party music. It's music love, women and understanding. It's a perfect disc for unwinding after a Friday exam.

"Sweat it Out" is a lifting musical experience because of the silly upbeat chorus, "Don't kow-tow/Don't bow-down/Loosen up/Get the lead out/Backs up let'em shout/Backs up sweat it out/When your backs up/Sweat it out/Backs up sweat it out." Although the meaning of the lyrics are ambiguous the song picks you up and gives you a natural high.

Elton John's tour made a stop at The Great Woods Center for the Performing Arts in Mansfield, MA. If you were unable to attend the open-air concert then you should buy The One. It's well worth your money.

Brando is the key on the HSCN

Hello, movie lovers from your ever faithful Housing Services Cable Network (HSCN) reviewer. I hope you have all had fun summers and pleasant experiences with phone add/drop, while I rip out my trying to muddle through all of the bureaucracy associated with graduating early. But until that fated day, a mere three months away, I will be keeping you up to date with the ever-popular Channel 7 movies. Here are the movies that will be shown from here 'til Wednesday.

Def-Con 4 — Lenore Zann, Maury Chaykin, Kate Lynch. Well, we're off to a good start here, huh? Quite possibly the cheesiest movie to hit the silver screen in 1984. A team of astronauts return to good ol' planet Earth to find it not so good anymore. A nuclear holocaust has occuured and now the planet is being run by bad actors covered with split pea soup. Take my word for it — turn the channel. NO STARS.

Enemy Mine — Dennis Quaid, Louis Gossett, Jr., Brion James. An original story about an Earthling and a space alien deserted on a wasteland planet, once bitter enemies but forced to become friends. Quite sappy and predictable at times, but it's a very warmhearted film. Gossett's makeup is realistically scaley and slimy. A very different role for Quaid. 1/2

Glory — Denzel Washington, Matthew Broderick, Cary Elwes. Three Oscars went to this extraordinary film about a white Northerner (Broderick) who is sent to train the first black regiment during the Civil War. Acting is superb all around, especially Washington who won the Oscar for Best Supporting Actor. Intensely powerful. ****

The Naked Gun: From the Files of Police Squad — Leslie Nielsen, George Dennedy, Priscilla Presley, O.J. Simpson. Hysterically zany spoof by the Zucker brothers is a laugh a minute flick about Lieutenant Frank Drebin and his "Inspector Clouseau-like" manner of solving cases. 1/2

Raw Deal — Arnold Schwarzenegger, Kathryn Harrold, Darren McGavin. Released in 1986, this movie typifies every AH-nold movie to come out around that time. He's all brawn and very little brain, and blows people away with very little effort. It makes me cringe — I'm used to seeing Arnold in more choice roles these days, so it's like a bad blast from the past. It does have some funny lines in it, and Schwarzenegger is more pumped up than he is now. Hey, if you have the time, catch it. **

Sister, Sister — Eric Stolz, Jennifer Jason Leigh, Judith Ivey. Two psychotic sisters turn their parents' house into a morbid guest house. Duh. It lacks. . . everything. NO STARS.

Stand By Me — Wil Wheaton, River Phoenix, Corey Feldman. Another one of those movies that I think everyone in the free world has seen, but hey, I'll review it anyway. It's actually based on a novella by Stephen King called "The Body." Don't you agree that River Phoenix was much better looking at 13 than he is now? What's up with that hair? 1/2

Steel Magnolias — Sally Field, Dolly Parton, Shirley MacLaine. Doctor Robinson! WARNING! WARNING! Tearjerker alert! Definitely a movie to see with the gals. . . It IS sappy at times, and Sally Field reverts back to the personality (personalities) she portrayed in "Sybil," but it's not one to be missed. ***

Top Secret — Val Kilmer, Lucy Gutteridge, Christopher Villiers. Ah. . .another wonderfully crafted film by the talented Zucker brothers, and let me tell you, any film that the Zuckers direct has potential. Kilmer is a rock star who becomes embroiled in espionage while touring in East Germany. It seems to lack an ending, but there are some unprecedented funny scenes. 1/2

The Wild One — Marlon Brando, Mary Murphy, Robert Keith. Timeless classic, though it may seem dated, about a motorcycle gang that terrorizes a small town. Brando, looking very un-Godfather-like in this 1953 film, is the leader of the pack. What can I say? The acting, direction, photography. . .incredible. Superb. First rate. ****

Movies that are on HSCN but are not reviewed are: Warning Sign, Flight of the Intruder, Grand Canyon, Hudson Hawk, King of New York, The Rose, Working Girl, Fatal Attraction and Return to the Blue Lagoon.

House votes to regulate cable, Bush plans veto

By DEANE DUSTON
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House responded Thursday to consumer complaints about escalating cable television rates and indifferent service by voting to put the industry under government control.

Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., sponsor of the bill that passed 280-128, called it the most important consumer legislation Congress would face this year. But President Bush said he would veto it because "it will hurt Americans by imposing a wide array of costly, burdensome and unnecessary requirements on the cable industry."

The measure now goes to the Senate, which was expected to act on it next week.

The cable industry has aggressively opposed the bill supported by such groups as the Consumer Federation of America, the AFL-CIO and the American Association of Retired Persons.

Key to the measure is Federal Communications Commission regulation of basic cable service which would consist of cable-delivered local broadcast and affiliates of ABC, CBS, NBC, Fox and PBS and public, educational and government cable channels, but not C-SPAN

The FCC would determine "reasonable" rates that customers should pay for those channels and ensure that equipment such as converter boxes and remote control devices also be priced reasonably.

The commission also said:

—Set service standards to protect against chronic outages.

—Guarantee that customers get quick telephone response to questions about billing, refunds and service problems.

Streamline its system for handling consumer complaints.

—Step in if cable charges for additional programming become exorbitant.

Rep. Sonny Callahan, R-Ala., said some people wonder "why is it we have a problem with a cable industry. The problem is that basically they are all a monopoly."

The bill addresses that condition with various provisions designed to help other television systems get a better foothold in the market. Lawmakers said they consider competition the most effective way to keep costs down.

The cable industry has fought the bill with full-page newspaper ads excerpting quotes against it from major metropolitan papers. It has used inserts in monthly cable bills and cable channel spots to contend the bill would create added costs that would be passed on to consumers.

The industry is most opposed to a requirement that they negotiate for local broadcast signals.

Under existing law, cable operators take broadcast signals for free to retransmit on any channel they choose.

Atlanta S&L nabbed in probe

By JAMES H. RUBIN
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The government today for the first time formally accused a mortgage lender of racial bias, saying an Atlanta savings and loan systematically favored Whites over Blacks in home loans.

At the same time, federal officials said they had settled the case and that the agreement could be a model for a nationwide attack on so-called "redlining," or race discrimination by home mortgage lenders.

The announcement of the settlement coincided with a campaign visit to Georgia by President Bush.

The Justice Department said Decatur Federal Savings and Loan Association systematically favored Whites over Blacks.

Since 1988, Decatur Federal rejected Black applicants for mortgage loans at almost three times the rate it rejected White applicants said a complaint filed in federal court in Atlanta.

The S&L, founded in 1927, put 42 of its 43 loan offices in predominantly White neighborhoods and, for example, since 1988 made 95 percent of its loans in those neighborhoods.

The complaint also accused the lender of excluding large parts of the Black community in Fulton County when in 1979 Decatur Federal defined its lending market.

Accused of violating the Federal Fair Housing and Equal Credit Opportunity Acts, Decatur Federal agreed to a wide range of remedial measures - including providing $1 million for 48 Blacks whose home mortgage applications were rejected between January 1988 and May 20, 1992.

Fourth arrested in gang murder

SPRINGFIELD, Mass (AP) — Police have arrested a fourth youth in what police believe was a gang-ordered slaying of a 16-year-old boy and say they are searching for others.

"I've seen big crowds, but this might top them all," funeral home director Paul Phaneuf said Wednesday as hundreds of people waited outside to get into the wake.

Many of the mourners said they came even though they had not known the boy. "People in this community feel bad," said Iris Ortiz. "We all feel sorry for him."

Hampden County District Attorney William Bennett said the boy was gunned down Sunday night because he made a derogatory comment about the signature beads worn by a member of the Latin Kings gang.

Hugo Morales, 18, of Holyoke was taken into custody Wednesday at the Westover Job Corps Center where he was a student, police said.

Ismael Cintron, 17, of Springfield and a 16-year-old, who was not identified because of his age, were arrested earlier on murder charges and Alex Delgado, 21, of New Haven, Conn., a student at UMass in Amherst, was charged with conspiracy in the killing.

Weld unveils jobs legislation package

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

Gov. William Weld said Thursday his jobs legislation would create "tens of thousands of jobs" and pump more than $1 billion into the state's economy through the 1990s.

Weld's bold prediction came during a day-long media blitz designed to win quick support for the package, which some Democrats have derided as politically-motivated proposition.

"The point is to make sure that job growth takes place along Routes 2 and 24 and 495 and 128 instead of going south on Interstate 95 or hopping a plane to Jersey or the Carolinas," Weld said.

"A generation of jobs is on the line here."

Buoyed by triple upgrade in the state's bond rating last week, Weld on Wednesday unveiled his economic development proposal before the Legislature.

The legislation, filed Thursday, calls for creation of a $30 million Emerging Technology Fund to help high-growth companies get the financing they need to expand, a $10 million small business capital access program to help businesses hit by the credit crunch, and a $10 million loan guarantee program for companies seeking to export their products.

The Republican governor said his "tens of thousands" of jobs prediction was "conservative." Spokeswoman Virginia Buckingham said the jobs prediction, along with Weld's $1 billion figure, was expected over five to 10 years.

Weld said the key to creating jobs and invigorating the state economy was tapping into overseas markets and rapidly growing markets, like biotechnology and telecommunications.

"It's the leverage that gives you the juice," he said.

But if companies follow the lead of Alpha-Beta Technology, a Worcester biotechnology firm that decided to build its manufacturing plant in Rhode Island, "those industries are going to be hard to rebuild," he said.

The administration's plan also would create a new umbrella agency to coordinate efforts to provide incentives; phase out the capital gains tax; an increase in the investment tax credit from 1 percent to 3 percent; and create enterprise zones that would allow economically depressed areas to offer tax and other incentives to bring in job-creating businesses.

Weld and Cellucci began to make good on the governor's promise to call every legislator personally and lobby on behalf of the package. The two shared Weld's desk, each on the telephone.

"Good morning, it's Bill Weld," Weld said the Rep. Stephen Brewer, D-Barre. "You're my first call of the morning."

University of Massachusetts President Michael Hooker told the Faculty Senate that universities must define a new role in the country's economic development without losing sight of their academic mission.

"My interest for the Amherst campus is for it to rebuild itself so we can return to the eminence we enjoyed prior to the downturn," Hooker said.

Hooker said the most important thing he will do this year is choose a new chancellor to replace Richard O'Brien. He is constructing a search committee and said he expects to have an appointment by early March.

At that time, de Klerk said legislation would be proposed to start negotiations on changes in the way Black homelands function. He did not elaborate.

Since the Ciskei shootings, ANC pressure to eliminate the homelands has increased, and it has demanded the removal of Ciskei's military leader as a condition for restarting political negotiations.

The Ciskei government, which opposes the ANC, said its soldiers fired on the marchers in self-defense. The ANC and witnesses have alleged the shooting began without provocation or warning.

The government set up tribal homelands in the 1960s and 1970s to keep Blacks and Whites separate. Only the government and homeland leaders recognize their sovereignty.

Weaver denies guilt, faces trial on Oct. 26

By QUANE KENYON
Associated Press

BOISE, Idaho — Randy Weaver pleaded innocent Thursday to federal charges that he took part in the slaying of U.S. Marshal William Degan in a northern Idaho shootout last month.

U.S. Magistrate Mikel Williams set Oct. 26 for trial, although defense attorneys said it could be postponed.

Weaver, 44, is charged with aiding and abetting Kevin Harris, 24, in the murder of Degan on Aug. 21. Assistant U.S. Attorney Kim Lindquist advised Weaver he faces a possible death penalty if convicted, the same penalty Harris could receive on the first-degree murder count.

Both men are charged with assaulting a federal officer, which could lead to 10 years in prison. The government also could impose a fine up to $250,000 on both counts.

The charges stem from a shootout that started in the woods near Weaver's rural cabin and resulted in the death of Degan and Weaver's son, Sammy, 14. The next day, Weaver's wife, Vicki, was killed in the family cabin when struck by a sniper's bullet.

Grand jury indictments, replacing the earlier federal charges, were filed Wednesday, during preliminary examinations for both men.

Defense attorneys say they will appeal decisions by Williams and Magistrate Larry Boyle refusing to quash the new indictments and examinations.

Defense attorney Gerry Spence argued prosecutors went to the grand jury for new indictments only because testimony in the preliminary examinations failed to support the charges.

Chuck Peterson, representing Weaver at Thursday's brief arraignment, said the defense case could take a month and Linquist said prosecutors would need 14 days.

Boyle, meanwhile, continued taking testimony in a detention hearing for Harris. Williams ruled that Weaver could not be released on bond pending trial.

members.

Each of the two misdemeanors carries a maximum penalty of a year in prison and a $100,000 fine. Sentencing was set for Dec. 9. She was released without having to post bond.

O'Rourke admitted in the plea that money was made available for the check-cashing service by withholding deposits of post office funds.

She also admitted using a government express mail account for shipping personal items for herself "as well as personal items that staff members for congressmen had instructed her to send by express mail."

The indictment only mentioned one congressional office using the government account to ship personal items.

The shipments were "in such quantities that the House Post Office staff was instructed to prepare pre-printed labels so that labels would be ready at a moment's notice," Wysong said.

In the post office probe, five lower-level employees of the mail facility have pleaded guilty to drug or embezzlement charges. The post office is staffed by House employees, not U.S. Postal Service workers.

The federal investigation reached a new stage last week when a federal grand jury indicted O'Rourke.

The indictment said post office deposits were withheld so personal checks of "legislative officials" could be cashed; House employees, on government time.

and retired CIA official Duane Clarridge.

Walsh's probe began in December 1986 and resulted in the convictions of former national security advisor John Poindexter and former White House aide Oliver North.

But a federal appeal court reversed or set aside those convictions, and all charges against North were eventually dismissed. Walsh said that in addition to the trials already scheduled, he will seek Supreme Court review of Poindexter's five convictions "in the next few weeks."

Walsh told The Washington Post in an interview published today that "if something comes up at the trials, and it always has, that could make us go back to work."

He said in the interview that "the passage of time has been a real detriment to sharpening the investigation."

"Women feel better if they have a perfect body, but it's never enough," said Levine.

The problem really isn't about food and weight according to Levine. The workshop is designed to help people understand that and the characteristics of eating disorders.

"It's beyond labels of anorexia or bulemia," said Levine.

The workshop will focus on helping people distinguish the two diseases, warning signs and the severity of the diseases, medically and psychologically.

"They learn the person really is in an emergency situation," said Levine.

The workshop will help students identify what resources are available and explore how eating disorders affect their relationships with that person, what they can do for the relationship, for themselves, for the person and things they cannot do, according to Levine.

Through the informal discussion and confidential process students will be able to recognize their limitations and learn how to cope better.

The workshop will be held Oct. 27 from 6-8 p.m. at Health Services room 304. There is no pre-registration. More information is available at 549-2671.

Easterns a test for UMass water polo

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts water polo team, 4-0 and ranked 15th in this week's national poll, are travelling to Princeton University this weekend for the first round of the Eastern Conference Tournament.

The second and third rounds will be played later in the season, and will determine which eastern team will represent the conference in this year's NCAA Tournament.

Last year's final round of the Easterns saw the team suffer two costly setbacks at the hands of Princeton and unheralded Washington & Lee. This weekend's games could provide some payback.

Saturday morning the Minutemen will face W.&.L., and although coach Russ Yarworth says revenge hasn't been discussed in practice this week, he feels the players are thinking about it.

"I don't like to say payback," he said, "but it's an easy way for the team to get motivated. One of the things I'm trying to do this year is to make them think one game at a time. They have to realize that they can't win just by showing up.

"I'm not the kind of coach who would run up the score just because a team beat us. I just want to play good polo."

After the W.&.L. game, Queens College will be next. Queens is a team that has been hurt by graduation and ineligible players, so Yarworth hopes to get his 'B' team some decent playing time.

After a four-hour rest the Minutemen will play Slippery Rock (PA.), in what is shaping up to be an early season battle for Eastern Conference supremacy.

"It's the prime-time match-up of the weekend," Yarworth said. "But, I don't want to put too much on each game, or too little on each game. If we win, that's great. If we lose, big deal. We'll play them later in the year."

Yarworth is concerned about the Rock's lefty driver, Frank Mulcrone, whom he considers to be the best player in the East this year, and utility player Joe Billish. Both players are hole-setters.

Freshmen Jason Bois and Tom Bean both replaced senior starters, a possible weakness that Yarworth hopes to expose, but he has no particular defense in mind to rattle the youngsters.

Sunday's lone contest is a match-up with Princeton, who beat UMass 8-6 last year in the first game of the final round of the Easterns, dashing any hopes of going to the NCAA.

"Hopefully we'll just go there and play how we are capable of playing," Yarworth said. "Our depth is a big plus. We have 10 or 11 players that I can put into a game and feel confident with."

GAME NOTES - Last week the team's health problem centered around a virus that was making the rounds. Luke Harlan, who sat out last week due to illness, should be ready to go this weekend. Pat Lau is also feelng better. Scott Reed and Javier Gonazlez are both nursing sore throwing shoulders, but will make the trip.

Rutgers scored a similar goal last season in a 2-1 overtime win by Massachusetts. The win propelled the Minutewomen into the NCAA tournament.

Rutgers boasts of a 2-1-2 record with wins over Xavier (OH) and Princeton. The Kinights tied Top 20 teams Wisconsin-Madison and Notre Dame. Their sole loss came at the hands of Temple.

"The tie against Notre Dame was impressive because it came the day after the Wisconsin game," Rudy said. "It shows they can play tough against anyone."

Massachusetts will start Briana Scurry in net. Scurry (2-0) lowered her goals against average to 1.00 after shuting out St. Mary's (CA) last Sunday.

Long, hot, sweaty nights. . .

Unbeaten men's soccer faces road test

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

Four home games, four wins. With those impressive numbers the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team begins a three game road trip with a 1:00 p.m. Saturday game against the University of Rhode Island Rams.

Also playing their first four games at home, the Rams have posted a record of 2-1-1. In their last outing, Rhode Island defeated the University of Hartford 2-0.

Offensively, the Rams have been sporadic, being shutout twice while scoring only four goals the whole year. Co-captain David DeMello, a senior defensemen, has scored two of the four Rhode Island goals this year.

An impressive freshman for the Rams has been midfielder Mike McDermott, who has three assists on the season. Other offensive weapons for the Rams include senior Todd Williams (one goal, eight shots), and senior Chris Simon (one goal, five shots).

Defensively, URI has been very sound this year, posting two shutouts and allowing only two goals in their four games. DeMello, in addition to his scoring prowess, leads the Ram defensive unit.

The goalie for Rhode Island is Corey Marpet. Marpet, only a sophomore, has stood tall in net for the Rams. In facing only fifteen shots in four games, Marpet has benefited from the tough URI defense.

In heading away from Garber Field, the Minutemen are facing a crucial three game stretch. Not only does UMass travel to Rhode Island, but they'll travel to Dartmouth and Atlantic 10 favorite Rutgers as well.

In their last outing the Minutemen hosted Holy Cross and came away with a 3-0 victory. UMass was lackadaisical early on, but turned it on in the second half to pull away from the Crusaders.

Now with three days off, the Minutemen are prepared to invade Rhode Island. Coach Sam Koch is anxious to play the Rams.

"I'm pleased with how we've played so far, now we'll see what we do on the road," he said. "URI is a tough road game, it's one of the key swing games in the A-10."

Junior defensemen Matt Edgerly, now returning after being injured against St. Bonaventure, is roaring to get back on the field.

"I'm definitely anxious to get back, URI is a huge game," Edgerly said. "Saturday, I'm going to be psyched and ready to go."

Game Notes: UMass' next game is on Wednesday on the road versus Dartmouth.

sional foes. Atlanta's offense will suffer from the loss of wideout Michael Haynes, who went out with an injury in last week's loss to Washington. However, the Falcons should have Andre Rison back and ready to play at full strength, after two weeks of just going through the motions. New Orleans is coming off a huge confidence booster, their victory over Chicago. They are in danger of a letdown at the wrong time, which is Sunday. Atlanta 27, New Orleans 21.

In my game of the week, perennial AFC powerhouse Denver travels to Veterans Stadium to take on Mr. Morrissey's favorite, the Philadelphia Eagles. Herschel Walker of the Eagles is playing like a man possessed, rushing for 229 yards in two weeks. He is tied with Dallas' Emmitt Smith for the league lead.

The Broncos' Mike Croel anchors the underrated defense, which will be overshadowed by Philadelphia, who are head and shoulders above anyone in the world on D. Randall Cunningham has never won a playoff game, and John Elway is a game breaker in the playoffs. However, this game is being played this week, not in January. Philadelphia 24, Denver 13.

It is time now for a new weekly feature, my Power Poll. In the AFC, Buffalo (2-0) seems to be on top of the conference, with big wins in the first two weeks. Denver has been consistent, earning the number two ranking this week, slightly ahead of Kansas City, whose defense is starting to make the difference.

The NFC is starting to prove why it is the better conference, with Philadelphia and Dallas, both undefeated, leading the way to their Monday night showdown in two weeks. The second half collapse last week by the Cowboys and the strong week by the Eagles gives Randall, Reggie, and crew the number one ranking. Troy Aikman, Michael Irvin, and Charles Haley are three reasons the 'Boys secure the second spot, slightly ahead of Washington and San Francisco. Until next week, enjoy the games.

Football faces tough Holy Cross squad

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

Most football teams start off their seasons with the proverbial "cream puff" to pad their schedule and get a few victories under their belts.

Not so for the University of Massachusetts Football squad, which, after losing to Delaware last Saturday, face perhaps an even more formidible opponent tomorrow - Division 1-AA power Holy Cross.

This puts into perspective just how tough a football team the Crusaders are: they have won 58 of 60 Division 1-AA games over the past six seasons . . . they have defeated 39 consecutive 1-AA opponents . . . they have not been shut-out in 144 straight games and they have the second most wins (60) in all of NCAA football over the past six years, trailing only the University of Miami.

However, so far this year, Holy Cross is reeling from a 17-7 defeat at the hands of Army last week and must be a little uneasy about playing a UMass team that is coming off a strong performance last Saturday.

"After watching all the tapes of last week's game, UMass is the same tough, physical team that I remember from past years," said Holy Cross head coach Peter Vaas. "They play with a lot of intensity from start to finish and have a very aggressive defense to complement an unbelievably huge offensive line.

"The difference between UMass' game last week and ours was that they were able to come up with big plays (the 44-yard scoring pass from UMass quarterback Andrew McNeilly to split end Matt Read) and we weren't; that's what a team has to do to win."

Just as Vaas has doubts about his teams opponent tomorrow, so does UMass Head Coach Mike Hodges about his teams foe.

"The only difference between getting ready for this week's game and getting ready for last week's game is that Holy Cross is a little shorter trip," he said. "They are the same kind of team (as Delaware): they're nationally ranked, have a great tradition and they're very well coached. It'll be a very tough game."

The Minutemen not only played a solid game last week, but were also very lucky as they arrived back in Amherst relatively unscathed after playing a hard-hitting team.

"We managed to get out of Delaware injury free except for a few bump and bruises," said Hodges. "That's a real plus for us because we'll be able to go into the Holy Cross game at full strength."

For UMass, redshirt freshman QB Andrew McNeilly will get the nod again for the second straight week after an impressive first week (8-18, 119 yds., 1 TD). Tailback John Johnson and fullback Mike George will share the ground game and the defense will be commandeered by inside linebacker Phil Lartrigue, who had 18 tackles last week, as well as outside linebacker Mario Perry and defensive tackle (and co-captain) John Creamer. The offensive line will be spearheaded by co-captain Bill Durkin.

The UMass/Holy Cross series over the years has been a good one as the Crusaders lead, 21-15 with five ties. Holy Cross has won four out of the last five contests including a 22-20 victory last year at McGuirk Alumni stadium. UMass last won in 1985, 27-3.

In order for UMass to produce a victory tomorrow, they will have to shut down the Holy Cross offense, just as Army did last week. Army managed to hold the Crusaders to just 173 yard on offense, including 6-for-16 passing, for 77 yards and 1 interception by quarterback Andy Fitzpatrick and 35 yards rushing by their fullback, Eric Sampson.

On defense, Holy Cross looks a bit more imposing. Defensive tackle Tom McDonald (6'4", 250) had 15 tackles vs. Army and inside linebacker Rob Milanette, a transfer from UMass, had an eye-popping 19 tackles, a fumble recovery and a pass deflection. Look also for cornerback Mike Walsh to have a good game.

"Our kids played really well last week but we made a lot of mistakes," said Hodges. "If we clean those mistakes up and get the same effort, we're going to have a great opportunity to play a good game against Holy Cross."

Busy weekend for field hockey

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The two teams that the University of Massachusetts field hockey team plays this weekend offer two totally different challenges.

The University of North Carolina (1-2), who the Minutewomen play in Brookline, Mass. on Saturday (1:00 p.m.), are a perennial national contender.

They typically finish in the top two in the country, and were national runners-up to Old Dominion last year, losing the NCAA title game 2-0.

Bucknell, Sunday's opponent (1:00 p.m., Totman Field), are a relatively weaker team, but their head coach is former UMass player and assistant coach Heather Lewis. This homecoming for Lewis could make Sunday's game distracting.

The Minutewomen haven't faced North Carolina since a loss in the Final Four in 1988. The Tar Heels are a young team, and have struggled early on in losses to the top two teams in the country, Old Dominion and Iowa.

UMass coach Pam Hixon said that she knows the Tar Heels will be up for the game and wouldn't want it any other way.

"I want to play these guys at their best," she said. "I want them to throw everything they have at us, and I expect an excellent contest.

"[North Carolina] is going to have the attitude that they're going to win, so we really have nothing to lose," Hixon said. "I expect us to just go out and play our game."

The Tar Heels have an unusually young team, with only two seniors returning.

They will start Michelle Kelley, a freshman, in goal against the Minutewomen. Kelley has struggled, allowing 10 goals in 210 minutes.

"They have some new faces, so I don't know what to expect," said Hixon.

"We'll just play our game, emphasize strong defense and try to get as many opportunities as we can."

After what is sure to be a highly competitive game in Brookline on Saturday, the Minutewomen return to Totman Field to face Bucknell, who will have a tough time keeping up with UMass.

One of the keys for Massachusetts will be not to letdown against Bucknell and Lewis, who as recently as last year was UMass' assistant coach.

Women's soccer travels to New Jersey

CHRISTOPHER EVANS /COLLEGIAN
Heidi Kocher and the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team face Rutgers this Saturday night in Piscataway, N.J.

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team has the good fortune of spending their weekend in lovely Piscataway, N.J. where they will hook up with the Scarlet Knights of Rutgers University.

No. 9 Massachusetts (4-0) will have to contend with a rugged Rutgers team which is fresh off a 1-0 victory over in-state rival Princeton.

"This is going to be a very tough game," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "They are a very physical team who play a strong defensive style. From what I am getting from other coaches they play physical, I am hoping the extracurricular stuff stays out of the game though."

The defense is keyed by goalkeeper Saskia Webber, who boasts of a 0.56 goals against average.

"Athletically [Webber] is among the very best in the country," Rudy said. "She has the ability to make big saves which intimidate teams. We need to keep the pressure on for 90 minutes and hopefully we can score one early."

Up front Rutgers will look to Christa Aluotto, who netted 13 goals last year and 2 so far in the 92 campaign.

"Aluotto is very fast, she is a great counter attacker, who knows how to finish," Rudy said. "The rest of their offense is off of free kicks where they just send a crowd in and crash the net. They hope to grab a loose ball and knock it in."

Stapleton's pigskin picks for week three

Hey, football fans, welcome to another weekly installment of Stapleton's Pigskin Picks. Before we look ahead to Week 3 of the NFL, let's take a trip around the league for some observations on last week's results on the gridiron.

For those of you who did not notice, the Tampa Bay Bucs are undefeated at 2-0. It seems as though Sam Wyche has given life to Vinny "Is that my receiver?" Testaverde, who threw for 363 yards and two touchdowns against the hapless Pack from Green Bay.

Arthur
STAPLETON

But remember, two weeks does not a season make. Therefore, all of you Bucs fans making your weekend plans for the Super Bowl, take my advice: cancel.

Last week's Stud of the Week was none other than Pittsburgh's Barry Foster (who did he say?). Yes, Foster ran for 190 yards and scored 2 touchdowns against the New York Jets. He may be emerging as a force in the AFC, as well as a threat to Buffalo's Thurman Thomas for the league's rushing title.

In a spectacular show last weekend, Thomas' Bills defeated the San Francisco 49ers, with Jim Kelly leading the way, throwing for 403 yards and three touchdowns. It is scary to think how the 'Niners defense was carved up. Actually, the Bills fared no better as super-sub Steve Young tossed three touchdowns as well, totaling a whopping 449 yards in the air.

Now to this Sunday, where our journey takes us to the Meadowlands in New Jersey, as the winless Jets get set to take on the same San Francisco team who poured on the points as mentioned above. The Jets are reeling, and this week should get no easier.

Without defensive end Jeff Lageman, who was placed on Injured Reserve, and an injured Browning Nagle, it will be tough to stop Young and Co., along with matching the offensive output. New York will have to wait another week to get a win. San Francisco 31, New York 10.

For the following game we travel down to the Georgia Dome, as the Atlanta Falcons take on the New Orleans Saints in a crucial matchup of divi-

Alcohol ban lifted at tailgate parties

By TAMI MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

A four-year policy banning alcoholic beverages at all scheduled outdoor events is to be lifted on an experimental basis this fall to allow drinking at football tailgate parties.

The decision to experiment with a limited alcohol policy was made in response to requests from alumni and other University football fans, according to Daniel Malley, interim vice chancellor for University Relations and Development.

"Other schools have safe and successful tailgating," Melley said. "We believe that the University can and should provide a traditional atmosphere in which alumni and other football fans can enjoy socializing before and after games."

The ban was instituted by former Chancellor Joseph Duffey in April 1988 in response to the violence which followed the 1986 World Series where predominately Black Meta fans were pitted against mostly White Red Sox fans.

The use of alcoholic beverages will be permitted for football season ticket holders in E Lot. Game day parking passes will be available for non-season ticket holders for $5 per car.

The tailgate area will be open two hours before the start of the game and also one hour following the game. The area will not be open during the game or at halftime.

Alcohol will not be sold and security personnel at the tailgating events, and laws regarding the state's drinking age and the transportation of alcohol will be enforced. Kegs, large containers and glass containers will not be allowed.

A number of University departments, including the alumni and development offices, athletics, public safety, student affairs, and the Student Government Association, were involved in the discussions about trying out a limited alcohol policy in

Ombuds report rise in campus anger, frustration

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

Noting "more hostility, anger, and frustration" between students and faculty than in past years, University of Massachusetts Ombuds officials said in their most recent annual report the office has been flooded with an increased number of grievance cases.

"Students and faculty have to take a hard look at why people are so angry," said the acting Ombudsperson Janet Rifkin. "We have to let the community know there is a tone of increased hostility and more contentiousness in a more problematic climate."

The report was distributed to about 125 different departments. University department heads have expressed concern and interest in addressing different issues mentioned in the report, such as the University's tense atmosphere, low morale and pressured students and staff, according to Assistant Ombudsperson Mary Wardwell.

"People are experiencing frustration and anger that is bubbling over into all aspects of life on campus," said Wardwell.

Cases brought to the Ombuds office range from academic, administrative, personnel and civility related along with miscellaneaous grievances. Wardwell has noticed that cases have had a more personal significance in the last couple years.

The report found the number of complaints of general harassment has more than doubled from 15 complaints in 1989/90 to 38 in 1990/91. The report suggested the high incidence of complaints to be a "manifestation of both a general climate of increasing intolerance and of the frustration and low morale among all members of the University community."

The report states that the office saw a dramatic increase in caseload this past year with 531 cases, a 10 percent increase over the previous year, which was a 7 percent increase over the previous year. The cases were described as continuing to be more complex and multi-faceted than in prior years.

The report also stated concern about a "marked increase" in tensions between faculty and students, with more students feeling mistreated, not liked or respected by faculty.

"Students see themselves as consumers, purchasing an expensive education, and expecting to be treated with respect and courtesy," the report stated. It found student complaints of "poor treatment, curtness and rudeness" by faculty and staff alike have become common of more greivances than in the past.

And faculty and staff are also reporting more often instances of "rude, harassing behavior and abusive behavior" by students, other staff and supervisors. The report considered such behaviors difficult to address, especially in a time period of diminishing resources with some of the best programs being cut.

But despite this climate and high number of complex cases, the Ombuds Office will continue to be a critical resource aiming to resolve problems as soon as possible according to Wardwell.

"My goal is to help people who come in to us effectively

Emily Blattman, 33, majoring in the University Without Walls might not be here at the University if it weren't for the Ombuds office.

Blattman found relief at the Ombuds Office after she went to them recently with a problem. Not obligated to pay a health bill during the fall and spring semesters, Blattman had a problem when the University included the health fee with the rest of her bill when she took summer classes here.

Blattman said she would be forced to give up her Medicaid if she had another health insurance and found it unnecessary to have two health insurances.

UM Collegian threatened with civil suit

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

AMHERST, Mass. — The student journalists at this state university haven't just been reporting the news. They've been making it.

The struggle for control of the Daily Collegian, the student newspaper at the University of Massachusetts, stem from radically different views of what a college publication should be. But it also raises fundamental questions about journalism: What is free speech? Should reporters be advocates or just chroniclers? Who should control the news?

Now, the battle over the paper threatens to spill into court with discrimination charges from an expelled editor and two colleagues.

"They rounded us up and the basis of national origin," declared one of the the three, Hussein Ibish. "We've been purged."

The turmoil bubbled up two days after the April

Poet Tate discusses his art, life

Pulitzer winning prof muses on life after the award

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN
Pulitzer prize winning UMass professor, James Tate

The Collegian's Christina Rothwell spoke with Pulitzer Prize winner and University of Massachusetts English professor James Tate several weeks ago in his cramped office on the fourth floor of Bartlett. James Tate was awarded the coveted literary award last spring for his 1991 poetry compilation, "Selected Poems." But national recognition is nothing new to this 49 year-old poet. At age 24, Tate won the Yale Series of Younger Poets award for his first book, "The Lost Pilot." A quarter of a century later, Tate is the author of over nine poetry books. Tate currently teaches the graduate course, English 780, Imaginative Writing and Poetry.

Did you know you would be receiving the Pulitzer Prize for poetry?

I had no warning, no rumor, no anything. It was pure delight.

Did your life change at all after receiving the Pulitzer Prize?

Life is wild for a few weeks. I did actually get another letter from Ted Kennedy this morning. That's the third one. Little things like that, you know. I spoke to the Senate and the House of Representatives in Boston. They invited me down to read a poem and gave me a plaque and all that stuff. So that stuff is extremely nice. The people throughout the University system have been very nice.

French voters give the nod to EC treaty

By DAVID CRARY
Associated Press

PARIS — French voters narrowly approved a treaty aimed at turning Western Europe into a political and economic superpower, according to unofficial TV projections of a bitterly debated referendum.

Capitals and financial markets worldwide had anxiously watched the vote.

Each of the two main television channels released projections minutes after polls closed at 8 p.m. (2 p.m. EDT). France 2 estimated the outcome at 51 percent to 49 percent in favor of the so-called Maastricht treaty, while TF1 projected the result at 51.5 to 48.5

The first partial official results, reflecting about 20 percent of the vote, show the "no" camp ahead, 52 percent to 48 percent. But analysts said these results were only from rural areas, where many farmers fought the treaty.

The projections prompted victory declarations from leaders of the pro-treaty campaign.

"It's a victory for Europe," said Education and Culture Minister Jack Lang.

"It's a pseudo-success - a mediocre yes," said far-right leader Jean-Marie Le Pen, who opposed the treaty.

While narrow approval would keep alive the European Community's hopes for a closer political and economic union, the weak public support could still cast doubt on the blueprint to carry the EC into the next century.

Defeat of the treaty could unleash renewed turmoil in world financial markets, damage the stature of French and other European leaders who promoted the accord and force the European Community into a fundamental reassessment of its future.

The treaty is designed to unite the 12-nation EC in common economic, foreign and defense policies and a single currency by 1999.

GOP trys luck in new districts

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — For Republicans, it was a dream come true.

Their Republican governor helped carve out congressional districts where the GOP could make inroads against longtime incumbents. Republicans could barely contain their glee after they negotiated changes in the state's congressional districts that will last into the next century.

The November election will test whether that map influences GOP chances to nab congressional seats from Democrats, who now have a lock on all 11 districts. The state lost a seat this year due to population shifts, and will send 10 members of Congress to Washington next year.

Last week's primary tempered some Republican hopes with reality. Republican leaders, including Gov. William Weld, now say they have a realistic shot at two seats. After the map was redrawn, they were talking higher numbers.

"I think the most likely outcome is two, maybe three (seats)," Weld said after the primary. "Certainly five is possible, but zero is also possible if we rest on our laurels."

Democrats are not ready to give any ground.

"We will succeed in spite of the bad hand that Bill Weld dealt us," said Democratic State Committee chairman Steven Grossman.

Republicans work at a distinct disadvantage in the state from the start, because there are a higher percentage of Democrats among the state's 3.1 million registered voters.

29 acquittal of the White policemen who beat Rodney King, an African-American, in Los Angeles. A group of about 250 Black, Hispanic, Asian and others students — overran its campus offices. They broke a window, ripped up papers, and renewed longstanding accusations that the paper and its editors are racist.

The protesters eventually forced the paper's staff into hiding and tried — with mixed success — to block publication by snatching up copies from news stands. Some editors reported death threats. A court later ordered counseling for a protester charged with assault for threatening an editor with a baseball bat. The paper closed for summer break several days early.

Editors returned to campus and reopened the paper without interference on Sept. 9 after months of negotiations and pledges to give more power to minority staffers.

But a day later, Editor-in-Chief Dan Wetzel removed three foreign graduate students as voting staff members, and they vowed to sue. He said a rule of the University's Student Activities Office, although sometimes unenforced in the past, bans graduate students from leadership and voting roles in undergraduate groups.

"What has happened to us is the most outrageous, blatant, and hideous act of discrimination," said the ousted editor, Madanmohan Rao, a 28-year-old Indian who is studying communications. He served as last year's editor of the paper's bimonthly Third World Affairs page.

Rao and his two colleagues, speaking at a news conference last week, asserted that they were dismissed from the paper because they are foreigners. They constituted the Collegian's entire Third World Affairs staff.

Their lawyer, Cristobal Bonifaz, said the three will sue both the University and the newspaper's editors if they fail by Tuesday to show a readiness to reinstate the graduates. Bonifaz filed a formal complaint Friday with the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination.

The three graduates said their differences with editors go beyond law. "They call our articles 'propaganda,'" said Rao. "We have different views of what journalism is."

He said the staff of the Third World page, not top editors should exercise control over its content. "We have been effectively censored and banned," said Ibish, a Lebanese student of literature.

But Wetzel said he is trying to preserve the 102-year-old newspaper, which circulates about 19,000 copies, as a training ground for future journalists.

"To have the Collegian to be an opinion sheet is not what we want," he said. "I want to get out and work for the Washington Post someday. They think the Washington Post is a Eurocentric rag."

Lisa Curtis, an arts staffer, said the graduate students did "huge editorials," in the guise of news, on international topics. "We want to be unbiased," she said.

"The newspaper business is not politically correct, but the protesters and many administrators think it is," said former editor-in-chief Gayle Long, who now works at the Transcript-Telegram in nearby Holyoke.

Some of this year's staffers said most points of contention have been resolved, despite the latest discrimination claims. But they also said fears for their personal safety were rekindled by the news that one of last spring's protest leaders, Continuing Education student Alex Delgado, was arrested on charges he conspired in a Springfield murder allegedly carried out this month by the Latin Kings, a nationwide gang.

Brooke C. Wheeler, this semester's managing editor, said she and others have been threatened by protesters in the past. "They make things vague enough so they can't be incriminating," she said.

The three graduates, however, said they are committed to dialogue.

For their part, University officials have said they seek to protect free speech at the newspaper. They have also pledged to review policy on graduate participation in undergraduate activities.

However, Tom Robinson, the vice chancellor for student affairs, also tried last week to nudge the school out of the line of fire: "I don't see it as a University issue. It's a Collegian issue."

The paper operates independently on a daily basis and supports itself through the sale of advertisements. But it uses campus office space and equipment, and it is governed in part by campus regulation.

"A matter of seconds"

Tired of calling University Health Services and waiting so long to speak to someone that your ailment has cured itself by the time you get through?

Nevermore. Now you can speak to a friendly computer voice who will gently lead you from department to department, from "Medical Emergencies" to the "Pharmacy" to "Appointments and Clinics" and much, much more.

A touch-tone phone allows you to access the menu by pressing the appropriate number while you listen to the choices.

But if you know your extension number, you can press it anytime to be immediately connected.

Judy Whitcomb, a systems manager for the new system, said the computer has been routing up to 550 calls an hour during peak periods.

"We used to have this one poor operator fielding all the calls. It took at least 20 rings to get to the operator," said Whitcomb.

"Now, it's just a matter of seconds."

Computer folks say they are currently trying to cleanse the system of several minor bugs.

"A person with a rotary phone was having to listen to the whole message," said Lynne Thompson, Health Services production manager.

"Though there might be some frustration listening to a whole menu, it's better than listening to a busy signal," she said.

To reach the automated attendant, call UHS at 549-2671.

No talent required

College students are now eligible to compete for the title of Miss Massachusetts USA in the pageant to be held in Worcester this November.

"Performing talent is not a requirement," said Myron Wasserman in a phone interview from the pageant headquarters in Boston.

So the pageant is based totally on how well you can prance around in an evening gown and slither in the swimsuit competition?

"It's a heck of a lot more than looks," Wasserman replied. "It's also poise, personality and beauty of face and figure."

This pageant is the official preliminary to the Miss USA and Miss Universe Contest.

Applicants must be at least 18 years of age and under 27 years of age by Feb. 1, 1993, never married and at least a six-month resident of Massachusetts.

"I hope we get some of your students," said Wasserman.

Get out and vote

Governor Bill Clinton, Senator Al Gore and their wives all took part in National Student Mobilization Day on Friday, September 18 — the official kick-off of the national campus registration drives.

Senator Clinton appeared at a rally at the University of New Mexico, at Albuquerque.

Senator Gore appeared at rallies on the campuses of Morgan State University in Baltimore and the University of Maryland at College Park. Hillary Clinton took part in a rally on the campus of the University of Colorado at Boulder while Tipper Gore appeared at Boston University.

"The energy we see is extraordinary. Thousands of students from all backgrounds are mobilizing on behalf of the Clinton-Gore ticket. And many more are registering for the first time," said Kate Frucher, the campaign's National College Coordinator.

The percentage of 18 to 24-four-year-olds who vote has dropped consistently every year since voting at age 18 was legalized 20 years ago.

"Students are ready to move this country forward. We realize we have power at the polls, and we're going to use it," said Frucher.

Black men seek better relations

Students meet at Malcolm X Center to resolve conflict

By MARTIN F. JONES
Collegian Staff

In an effort to improve relations between Black men on campus, students gathered at the Malcolm X Cultural Center last night to discuss ways to resolve conflict and improve communication.

The meeting was called by Douglass Greer, president of the UMass Lamda Nu Chapter of Phi Beta Sigma. Greer said the purpose of the meeting was to provide a forum in which differences that have caused conflict between Black men on campus could be brought out into the open.

> "It was good to see people come together and talk out their differences. I hope we can all come together and settle our differences within the community and help improve the University."
> Kenard Robinson
> UMass basketball forward/center

Members of the UMass men's basketball team were invited to discuss a prevailing rift that has existed between them and many Black men on campus who are not on the team.

Kenard Robinson, a senior forward/center majoring in real estate management, said he found the discussion to be productive.

"It was good to see people come together and talk out their differences," he said. "I hope we can all come together and settle our differences within the community and help improve the University."

Sophomore forward Lou Roe, a communications major, said he wished there was a greater turn-out but he called it a "good start."

Also discussed was the relationship between Black fraternities and the athletes on campus. Both sides acknowledged that their high visibility contributes to tension between their groups.

Lorenzo Sutton, a former UMass basketball star, who is also in a fraternity, cited how a dispute between two individuals can escalate and eventually involve their respective groups.

"I'm in two frats," he said, "Omega Psi Phi, and the ball team. If there's a problem with someone in my frat, than it becomes a problem with me too."

Two men from United Brothers, a peer group established last year by a group of Black freshmen males, also attended the discussion.

"UB is about academics," said one of the members present. "If one of us has a problem or needs help with a paper, we help each other out."

An ongoing dispute between United Brothers and members of the men's basketball team had been a major factor in encouraging the discussion.

Many of the differences that were acknowledged were attributed to poor communication. These disputes tended to stem from relationships with women on campus.

There was also a feeling of alienation expressed by members of the team who felt that the Black community had not fully accepted them due to their high profile and status.

One participant in the discussion suggested that they attend the next meeting of the Black Student Union this coming Wednesday, and express that sentiment before the general community.

James Flint, assistant coach for the men's basketball team, agreed with the idea to attend BSU meeting. He went further to stress that such discussions needed to continue. One student present suggested that a Black Men's Group, similar to an existing group at Amherst College, be established at UMass to help maintain "a positive line of communication into the future."

Prof speaks on China's reforms

By GEORGE ZHU
Collegian Correspondent

Professor Wen Yuankai, a leading Chinese liberal intellectual who in early '80s was among the first calling and pushing for greater economic and educational reforms in China, told a group of Chinese students and scholars at the University Saturday night he is "cautiously optimistic" about China's ongoing economic reforms.

"The economic system in China today has fundamental differences compared with 10 or 20 years ago," said Yuankai. "Private and non-state sectors now constitute over 40 percent of Chinese economy."

He appealed to overseas Chinese professionals to seize the golden opportunity to participate in China's economic development through various channels.

Yuankai's speech, co-sponsored by the Chinese Professionals Club in U.S.A., the China Democracy Fund and the Chinese Students and Scholars Association at the University came nearly three weeks after he arrived in the United States to begin a six month research at the California Institute of Technology.

Because of his involvement in the 1989 Tiananmen democracy movement, Yuankai was expelled from the CCP and removed from the Chairmanship of the Department of Applied Chemistry at the University of Science and Technology of China three years ago, and was under house arrest for as long as 15 months. He was then barred from all teaching, research and academic activities.

Speaking about his past hardships and success, Yuankai expressed his deep appreciation of the kind concern and help he received from Chinese students and scholars overseas. Earlier this year, Chinese students and professionals across the United States and other countries petitioned the Chinese authorities demanding it respect. Yuankai's human rights and and allow him to leave for the United States to accept an invitation from Caltech as a visiting scientist.

When asked on the recent legislation in the U.S. Congress which would impose strong conditions on China to renew its Most-Favored-Nation status, Yuankai said he believed it would be difficult for China to accept any imposed conditions "because Chinese don't want to lose face."

Local engineers warn stricter codes needed

By JEFF BARNARD
Associated Press

LIHUE, Hawaii — As homeowners begin to repair and replace houses ripped apart by Hurricane Iniki, Kauai County planning director Jeff Lacey wonders whether, this time, they'll be made to do it right.

Ten years ago, after Hurricane Iwa lashed the island with 80 mph winds and 30-foot waves, a team of engineers recommended stricter building codes, especially to prevent roofs from blowing off and oceanfront homes from being washed away.

Instead, the Kauai County Council waived building permits for emergency repairs and, for a year after the storm, allowed people to get permits after they had rebuilt.

"The magnitude of the problem after Hurricane Iwa and people's need to get on with things outweighted the perceived need for holding people to codes," said Lacey.

Hurricane connectors, which tie rafters much more strongly to wall frames than nails alone, weren't required until three years later, when they became part of the National Uniform Building Code.

And as long as they build 40 feet from the high water mark, people can still put houses along the shore, where the worst damage occurred.

"This is very painful for me," said Arthur Chiu, the University of Hawaii professor who led the engineers' inspection in 1982, and who spent three days assessing Iniki's damage on Kauai. Good construction practices based on the '82 Iwa recommendations could have lessened the damage, Chiu said.

This time around, Lacey and his staff would like to do something about the flimsy corrugated metal roofs, common on local houses, so they won't become lethal Frisbees in the wind.

But can they enforce strict building codes when 10,000 homes - half those on the island - are damaged and people want to rebuild as quickly as possible?

And can anyone restrict construction on small oceanfront lots that cost half a million dollars?

Near Baby Beach at Poipu, on the southern shore of Kauai, Julia Souza drove as far as she could before the pavement disappeared, then walked to what was left of the house she has lived in all her life.

This is the fourth hurricane to hit the house: Dot in 1957, Nina in 1959, Iwa in 1982 and now Iniki, the strongest of them all with sustained winds of 98 mph.

The last two storms tore the roof off, even though the Souzas replaced the corrugated metal with composition shingles.

But it's something they accept as the price for living near the ocean.

The Supreme Court ruled this year that when oceanfront property is declared unbuildable, the owner can sue for compensation. It is unlikely Kauai will change its rules about how close buildings can be to the high water mark because it would make many small lots unbuildable, Lacey said.

State officials abuse job for food, trips

BOSTON (AP) — Top officials of a state authority that issues low-cost bonds to businesses and nonprofit institutions reportedly have enjoyed costly meals, trips abroad and valet parking at the agency's expense.

Administrators of the Massachusetts Industrial Finance Agency charged the agency for 959 restaurant meals in the last three years at a cost of $35,415, according to the Boston Sunday Herald.

They spent $64,000 in the last two years leasing cars for the top four employees, and $290 a month for valet parking.

MIFA officials "seem to think they're immune from the sacrifices of so many others," said House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Thomas Finneran, D-Boston.

"Those people are paid well down there," Finneran said. "I don't think they need all that travel and those restaurant perks."

But Joseph D. Blair, MIFA's executive director, said, "It's just plain good sense that you have to spend money to bring in more resources to make business grow in this state."

MIFA officials picked up meal tabs for each other or for consultants and bond underwriters who already were receiving payments from the agency. Many were at expensive restaurants in the Meridien, Boston Harbor and Bostonian hotels, including one dinner in May 1990 for which Blair billed the agency $297.25.

The only other guests: MIFA's chief financial officer, Lawrence Smith Jr., and Smith's wife. Smith was being recruited by MIFA at the time.

MIFA General Counsel Richard Skerry charged 124 meals to the agency, many of them attended only by fellow employees.

"MIFA, by design, is supposed to work like an investment bank," Blair said. "Very few investment bankers go to McDonald's."

The agency isses tax-exempt and cut-rate bonds to companies, nonprofit institutions, health-care facilities and cities and towns to stimulate the economy and generate jobs. It was established by an initial $10 million state appropriation in 1978 and is run by a nine member board of directors appointed by the governor.

MIFA has 23 employees and spends more than $300,000 a year for lawyers, lobbyists and public relations speciailists - among them, some of the most politically well-connected and expensive in the state.

Blair makes $100,000 a year, Skerry and Smith $75,000 a year each. Each also receives a 10 percent annual bonus placed into a retirement account.

and as timely as we can," said Wardwell.

The major factor, which Wardwell considers to influence so many is the economy. Students face problems with housing, financial aid and course offerings as faculty cope without receiving pay raises in four years and decreased staff members.

"People are really feeling the pressure," said Wardwell.

But Wardwell said these problems are only a symptom and not the cause.

"Mistakes occur, misunderstandings happen, people always have some problem. But in this kind of climate, it's harder to deal," said Wardwell.

However students and faculty can find relief from the office which investigates, makes recommendations, facilitates resolutions and negotiates settlements confidentially according to Wardwell.

"When students run into a brick wall there is some place to go," said Wardwell.

"What students can get when they come here is someone who can look at their problem from a neutral viewpoint. We are not in any position to force people to do anything," said Wardwell. "We offer advice and strategies in an informal process they can stop when they want to."

The Ombuds Office will be working with other agencies such as Human Relations, the Civilty Commission and the Affirmative Action Advisory Board to address different issues according to Wardwell.

Administrators express concern

William Harris, the Campus Director said he was "somewhat dismayed" after reading the report and is concerned about students perception and experience with campus food services and retail stores.

"I want to be sure we are not contributing to the great deal of anxiety," said Harris.

Dean of Students Jo-Arme Vanin said she was not surprised with the content of the report as she read it. Recognizing the campus to be in its fourth year of depression she understood why people are feeling strains and external stress.

She said the report's concerns need to be addressed sensitively to deal with the environment more productively. With people feeling less patient and understanding she finds the Ombuds Office a necessary resource.

"It's like police — you wish you didn't have to have it, but are glad you do," said Vanin.

Like Vanin, the report did not come as a surprise to Provost Glen Gordon in the midst of low morale, no faculty pay raises and loss of 250 faculty members.

Despite these circumstances, Gordon said he is hopeful that morale will improve as the budget situation improves.

Earle tells some tall ones

I will not begin to insult anyone's intelligence by saying that writers are not full of shit. In a nutshell, they are. People love to tell stories and converse among the masses, it is a part of our everyday lives. I bullshit and am therefore a bullshit artist. A.B.A., if you will. For the next fifty or so lines, all that you shall read is a pack of lies which can be disregarded or taken into consideration as brilliant B.S..

All that has been written and all that you learn is wrong.

Kris K.
EARLE

There is no place called Earth and life actually is a dream.

"School is the process of learning how to listen to others and to believe that everything they teach you is correct."

The banana should not be in the fruit group because it is actually a meat by-product.

My cousin-in-law is deathly ill and will never recover because of the lack of funding to the hospitals.

Prince sounds so much better than he used to with the "New Power Generation," and he should not dump them.

In Reno, Nevada, there have been four sightings of a vigilante named "Vinnie" who dresses up in tights and beats on bad guys with a large salami. Authorities do not approve of his behavior.

The moon is made of green cheese and cows graze there.

I have never been in the White House, I plan to vote for George Clinton, and I saw the ghost of Abraham Lincoln eating "Popcorn Chicken" at the Kentucky Fried Chicken in Hadley.

I want to have a family with at least twelve kids so I and my spouse can name them all after doughnuts. "Hey, Boston Creme, stop hitting Cruller in the head!" "Apple-filled Earle," can you dig it? For the first few months, we will call them Munchkids.

One of your good friends is scheming behind your back, and has hated you for years without you knowing it. That is what we all have friends for, isn't it? To screw each other over after being buddies since the second grade? Ya. I do not approve.

Larry Bird really retired from basketball because of the practical jokers around the courts. I heard that some silly person replaced the basketball with a bowling ball during game four of the N.B.A. Finals. Sporting sportsmen do not approve.

Your parents really did not want you to go to college and to be a success. They want you to come home and live off their hard-earned money for the rest of your life and to never move out of your "Sesame Street" wallpapered bedroom.

Captain Hook must have a hard time when he has to scratch an itch on his back.

To electrocute a human being is wrong. But to electrocute a bunch of bugs in the summer with one of those things that you hang on the porch, and to hear them go "zaaaaap!" is just plain fun. I bet Bill C. digs the summertime.

I am very insensitive, arrogant, and unfunny. But all of the chicks dig me. And all of the studs. In fact, I am a reincarnation of King Midas and my purpose here is to turn your days into gold.

I also brush with "Crest" because it tastes great and is less filling.

Now for the point behind the madness:

Don't believe everything that you hear, that is how wars start. If someone tells you a story or a rumour about someone else, do not think of it as the absolute truth to pass on to the next person. It is in human nature to misinterpret or exaggerate in order to spice up the bullshit stories; the listeners then think that the speaker is an excellent conversationalist. The rules apply for both speaking and writing. Too many people in the world know what they believe is the story versus the actual events. For your sake, my sake, and everyone else's, chill out, take it cool, and believe whatever you wish, but until the facts are as straight as they will ever get, keep your bullshitting to a minimum. There is a time to kid and a time to stay sober. And that is no joke.

President has no basis for self-congratulations

STOP THE PRESS!!! News just in: President Bush, addressing the Detroit Economic Club last week, revealed that "the American people have just completed the greatest mission in the lifetime of our nation — the triumph of democratic capitalism over imperial communism."

Jesse
ARMSTRONG

It will come as something of a surprise to the peoples of eastern Europe and the ex-Soviet Union to learn that it was not they, out on the streets of Prague, Moscow, Bucharest, Vilnius and Berlin, who caused the '89-'90 revolutions. Nor, according to Bush, was it the vision and bravery of leaders like Vaclav Havel, Lech Walesa and Mikhail Gorbachev, or even the imprisoned dissidents and numerous martyrs. What brought down fifty years of totalitarian government behind the Iron Curtain was something quite different.

It seems that the truth has been hidden from us all the time, but finally modest George Bush has reluctantly let it slip; it was him all along, he and the American public, who liberated Europe.

Bush once promised not to "dance on the Berlin wall," meaning he wouldn't attempt to make political capital out of the fall of the old communist governments. Unfortunately that promise, like so many others, has gone out the window this election year.

With all the talk of the collapse of communism, has it escaped ex-ambassador to China Bush that one quarter of the world's population are under the impression that they still live under such a system of government?

Of course not. And to prove it there is a vigorous Bush program designed to sweep away the oppressive Chinese regime. What, you may ask, does this program consist of? An "Operation Mountain Storm" to free illegally-seized Tibet and a tortured and suppressed people? No. (Maybe if they could barrel up them Buddhists and export them. . .) Sweeping economic and military sanctions to foster and support the resistance movement we saw crushed in 1989? No. In fact, the Bush program to isolate the Chinese leadership we saw murder its own people in Tiananmen Square is continued support for the most-favored nation trading status for China.

The rationale behind keeping open diplomatic and trade links with the People's Republic, despite its appalling human rights record has been that such a relationship makes it possible for the U.S. to have some influence on Chinese policy-makers, a kind of leverage the State Department would not enjoy were relations more frosty.

Now it seems that President Bush, man of steely resolve that he is, is about to sour relations with China and abandon at least ten years of diplomatic legwork by sanctioning the sale of 150 F-16 fighters to Taiwan. This action would be a direct breach of the 1982 Sino-American communique promising not to increase the quality or quantity of Taiwanese arms, and is of course in no way connected to the vital votes of Fort Worth, Texas, where the F-16 just happens to be produced.

When the Chinese communist empire does fall it will be interesting to see if President Bush will be able to avoid the falling masonry, and nimble-footed enough to still try to take the credit for it afterwards.

Publishers set high book prices

Kelly Spang's article, "Students shocked by textbook prices [Collegian, Sept. 11]," is yet another example of a scantily researched and even more poorly analyzed piece of journalism. She concludes that the growing used-book industry is forcing financially hard-pressed publishers to hike up textbook prices in order to break even. Little does she realize that the publishing giants engage in fierce warfare with their avowed enemy, the entrepreneurial used-book stores. Spang relays the publishing industry's allegation that the student/consumer's enemy is the local used-book store, and she does so without consulting used-book store owners. If one consider the facts, a dramatically different outcome emerges.

If anyone has helped to control the sky rocketing prices of textbooks in recent years, it has been used-book stores. The pressure they apply has put a check on the exorbitantly high mark-ups applied by most bookstores dealing in new books.

Far from being innocent bystanders in the textbook war, the publishers have mounted an aggressive campaign to put used-book stores out of business. Notice how often editions are "renewed." Most science texts are "updated" every couple of years, nullifying any market share on the part of used-book stores; a couple new graphs, new font to throw off the pagination and, boom, the text goes up 10 bucks. The new edition certainly ensures that the fresh-off-the-press texts furnished by the publishers will sell. But at whose expense? If anything, a new edition restricts choice on the part of the consumer because the text can only be found at the "designated" new-book store. The new-book stores savor the opportunity, now arising every couple of years, to mark up texts as high as 33 percent above the suggested price.

Don't believe the publishing giants. Do you really think that prices would be kept in check if they were granted the oligopoly they are so ruthlessly seeking? We know better than that. Let's face it: competition benefits consumers.

If you write. . .

We opened up the mailbox today and found a letter. We rejoiced, ran to a desk and prepared to type.

But first, we tried to call the person who wrote it, and there was no phone number on the column.

So we called the Student Directory, who said they couldn't find anyone by that name.

We searched the entire Pioneer Valley.

Apparently, we had a mystery writer. According to the powers in control, the writer didn't exist.

If you don't exist, neither does your letter.

We would really like to print your letters, but you need to sign your name, your address and your phone number. It's the right thing to do. Really.

Policeman's sexist comments were not 'friendly'

I am writing in response to the letter by Jennifer Fazzi [Collegian, Sept. 18] which essentially defended the sexist remarks of two University police officers.

I applaud Evelyn De Jesus' column [Collegian, Sept. 15], which sheds light on the fact that policeMEN are not different than other men in regards to their ignorance about issues of women's oppression. I would like equally to thank Ms. Fazzi for her remarks, which remind me that many women still need to be educated about why some comments are sexist and why they cannot be tolerated.

It is clear that a remark like the one made by these two officers perpetuates and breeds ignorance and the oppression of women.

Whether or not the police officers were attempting to help, the fact of the matter is that they initially approached Ms. De Jesus because she was cursing, which is something a "proper woman" would never do.

F— proper! NO ONE, not even a cop, has the right to tell a woman how she should express herself.

Part of achieving equality for women means breaking the kinds of 19th century "women are pure and frail" stereotypes which are still used by men today to control women's speech and actions.

I highly doubt that the police officers would have approached a man who was cursing and said, "Such a handsome man, and with that mouth." The University should clearly institute an educational program for all our campus security and law enforcement officials.

To Evelyn De Jesus, I say, "Thank you." To Jennifer Fazzi, I can only suggest that you open your eyes and take a few more women's studies classes.

Mr. Lupo Singles out funny flick

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Whenever movies about relationships try to show that they're not all fairy tales and happy endings, it inevitably gives us that happy ending, inflating the audience with hope that there is, somewhere, someone that belongs with us. Singles did that to me. It also made me laugh at the sight gags and marvel at the crisp writing, enjoy the great performances of the actors and sing along with the soundtrack.

Singles, the new film by Cameron Crowe who wrote Fast Times At Ridgemont High and directed the intelligent teen comedy (isn't that a contradiction in terms) Say Anything, tells the story of early twentysomethings trying to find love and make it in the world (any resemblance to Melrose Place is strictly coincidental).

There's Campbell Scott (Longtime Companion), an employee with the Department of Transportation in Seattle who hates (but always ends up) playing the game. He meets a woman played by Kyra Sedgwick (Born on the Fourth of July) who finally has a place to herself, a woman whose idea of commitment involves garage door openers. They've both been burned before yet fall in love anyway.

Another couple is played by Bridget Fonda (Single White Female), an aspiring architect who works as a waitress with Matt Dillon (remember him?), the horrible lead singer of Citizen Dick, a band that's "big" in Europe ("They love us in Belgium and Italy") but not in America. Basically, he doesn't appreciate her, even after she almost gets breast enlargements to please him.

Other characters include Sheila Kelley as a woman who pays a guy (Batman director Tim Burton in a cameo) 20 bucks to film her (hilarious) computer date video. There's also a good bit with Peter Horton, the guy who played Gary on thirtysomething, spoofing his sensitive TV character.

The characters go through all sorts of minicrises, some truly funny and others just a little melodramatic. Singles' strength is in the little truths it displays regarding today's relationships: the hurt, the love and the laughter (oh great, I sound like the back of a bad paperback romance novel). It's only fault perhaps is that the resolutions come full circle too neatly and you get the feeling that all the trouble in these people's relationships are over once the credits roll.

However, most of Singles is very funny and cleverly written. Writer-director Crowe reportedly spent two and a half years bumming around Seattle in preparation for this movie. It shows up on screen when those little truths I was talking about turn

Words and Pictures 2:

The scoop on where to buy comics in the Valley

By KIP MANLEY
Collegian Correspondent

This is generally intended to be a column reviewing the comics themselves, but I thought it might be wise to devote some space to letting you know where to find what I'm telling you to take a look at. Comics are popping up all over the place, from spin-racks in Waldenbooks, to newsstands in quirkier music stores—next to the magazines about the latest grunge bands that are too hip to ever be popular. But following the logic which states that books are to be found in bookstores and groceries in grocery stores, the best place for hunting down comics is the comics store.

By anybody's best guess, there are over 5,000 comic stores scattered across the country, and the Valley is certainly has its share. So, here's a guide to the three comics stores in the area which are easily reachable by PVTA buses from the UMass campus. We'll take them in alphabetical order.

That makes Crossroads Comics and Games first. Crossroads is also the largest and nearest of the three stores, being located under the D'Angelo's sub shop and the Chips ice cream parlor at 48 North Prospect Street in downtown Amherst. "I would have to say our selection is our strongest point," said John Wrisley, who along with George Brace owns and operates the store. "We stock a lot of independents and adult books and graphic novels — more than most stores — for the college crowd, for older, more literate people. And we have the largest back-issue selection in the area."

He isn't wrong. Crossroads uses its large space well, with more shelf and bin space than the other stores, allowing them to display more comics. Sometimes, however, this space is used to spread out more issues of the more popular titles, and titles without such broad appeal are stacked on top of each other on the shelves, hiding them from the roving eye of the browsing consumer. Browse more deeply, though. You will be rewarded. Crossroads does have the largest selection of comics in the area.

In addition to comics, Crossroads also offers role-playing and war games, trading cards, and storage supplies for the serious collector, and has Japanimation and genre movies for rent.

Lance's, on the other hand, carries comics, comics, and nothing but comics. "My store — it's for comics readers," says Lance Majkowski, owner and sole proprietor. "I'm not a collector, I'm a reader — I hope the books that go out with you are books you enjoy."

Lance's is located under a really nifty logo at 185 Main Street in Northampton. The store is small, but well-stocked, and while he doesn't have a lot of shelf space, he does his best to use it well, separating comics by publisher for the browser and being democratic about allotting space to each title. "I'm very concerned about giving Betty and Veronica or Naughty Bits as much shelf space as the Amazing Spiderman," said Majkowski. "I don't think comics are just Hulk or Spiderman or Superman."

Same Bat Channel, in the Hampshire Mall, is part of a growing phenomenon — the chain comics store. There are a total of six Bat Channel stores (one of which is located in the Holyoke Mall, also reachable by PVTA buses). "Despite appearances, we're not a McComics store," says Steve Longpre, the manager of the Hampshire store.

"We have the best customer service," says Nick Moscato, assistant manager — "we're people who know what we're talking about." When you enter the store you notice the recommendations everywhere — it seems everybody has a favorite comic and is more than willing to share it with you. "We're trying to do our best to tailor to the differing tastes of people," says Longpre. "We have a lot of repeat customers and we get to know them well."

The Bat Channel is the smallest of the stores in terms of display space, but they have the best method of displaying their comics — racks with clear plastic fronts that keep the comics from wear and tear. Still, they have the smallest selection as well, and the visibility of less popular titles is often sacrificed for more display space for the bigger-selling superheroes.

But even knowing where the stores are and what they're like won't make things easy. The Comics industry ruthlessly follows Gresham's Law: the bad, drives out the good. The comics that sell the most and therefore the comics that get the most exposure are predominately the adolescent superhero soap operas, while the better stuff is less popular. Retailers often order only enough of the better comics to satisfy their regular customers, so as to leave money and space free for their cash cows, which means they frequently sell out.

Hatfield's voice is her power

By TONY WESTCOTT
Collegian Staff

The first song on former Blake Babies member Juliana Hatfield's first solo album is titled Everybody Loves Me But You. I cannot speak for the "you" she is referring to in the song but appropriately enough, everyone who knows of Hatfield does indeed love her.

The first thing that hits you is her voice. Hatfield has a naturally high-pitched voice that can convey playfulness, despair or anger and it always rings true. She steals the show with the backup vocals she contributes to the Lemonheads' most recent album, It's A Shame About Ray. And if you thought Harriet Wheeler of The Sundays did sensuous well, you'd better be at the Iron Horse Tuesday night.

Secondly, Hatfield's songwriting since she formed The Blake Babies in the late '80s has amounted to an impressive source from which she should draw a faultless concert of spell-binding tunes. Old Blake Babies favorites such as "Nirvana" and "I'm Not Your Mother" and new gems from "Hey Babe" will make believers out of anyone with an ear for tuneful songs about the intricacies of relationships.

Undercutting Hatfield's songs is a sharp guitar style that confidently veers at times into dissonance. Indeed, Hatfield is prone to flail on her axe like guitar heavy Bob Mould, whom she cites as an influence or pommel a bass like Firehose's Mike Watt, who makes a cameo on "Hey Babe." It's no wonder why everyone loves Juliana Hatfield so how about "you?"

Juliana Hatfield will perform at The Iron Horse Tuesday Sept. 22 at 7 p.m. Tickets $6.50 Adv.

Twitch your nose with The Bewitched Book

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

The Bewitched Book
Herbie J. Pilato
Delta

Popular culture is a tricky thing. One person's dearest memories are another's trash. Is television our instant culture or are we just a generation of rerun-watching, channel-changing couch potatoes who can't name our first five presidents but can name all the Brady kids (including Oliver)?

That reasoning seems to be behind The Bewitched Book, a nauseatingly 300 page guide to "TV's most magical supernatural situation comedy."

Author Herbie J. Pilato (who is touted as probably "the world's foremost authority on the "Bewitched" television series" — what a distinction) recounts everything to do with the ABC sitcom that ran from 1964 to 1972. The story was simple: modern day witch Samantha (Elizabeth Montgomery) marries mortal ad-exec Darrin (Dick York and Dick Sargent — I'll get to that whole thing later), who forbids her to use her magic powers.

The plot for every episode was just about the same. They involved Samatha trying not to use her magic powers. But either some other witch (her mother Endora, Agnes Moorhead, her evil look-alike cousin Serena, etc.) or some pesky ad campaign Darrin was working on would screw something up and she would have to fix it. Okay, so maybe it wasn't so simple.

According to this book, "Bewitched" was quite popular in its day and was nominated for 22 Emmy awards. Although the show won several awards for supporting players and direction, the program (as well as Montgomery) continually lost. "Bewitched" once lost to "The Monkees" for best comedy series. Wow, what a contest.

Pilato provides so many idiosyncracies of a show that doesn't seem really worthy of it. The Bewitched Book includes stories of the show's inception (it began filming on the day of JFK's assassination — quick! call Oliver Stone), a complete 254 episode guide, biographies of the stars, an "enchanted lexicon" of the program's popular phrases, all of Darrin's ad accounts and as if anyone cares, a discography (which includes "Bewitched"-related songs by Peggy Lee and Lawrence Welk).

The big question that came up while reading this competently written and photo-filled book was WHY? "Bewitched" wasn't exactly groundbreaking. Although Pilato cites several episodes that dealt with racism and prejudice (Samantha actually exclaims, "I belong to the greatest minority of them all. . . I'm a witch!") and pointing out that Darrin and Sam did in fact have a mixed marriage, mostly the show was about the trials and tribulations of. . . twitching one's nose.

COURTESY COLUMBIA PICTURES TELEVISION
Elizabeth Montgomery and Dick York from Bewitched.

The overwhelming amount of exhaustive information packed in The Bewitched Book does actually serve a purpose, if only to solve once and for all the controversy over the two Darrins. To save you the money, here the scoop: Dick York (the first Darrin) was filming a movie with Gary Cooper in 1959 when he hurt his back terribly during a stunt. When he returned to "Bewitched" that season, the pain eventually forced him to miss twelve episodes and then to be replaced by Dick Sargent in 1969. York was known as the "neurotic, hyperactive Darrin" while Sargent was tagged the "kinder, gentler" Darrin.

With that burning issue out of the way, do we really have to know the Stephens' three different telephone numbers or that Tabitha wears Poughkeepsie woolen socks in episode 55 or even that two of Darrin's most hard to get accounts were the "Fuzz Doll" and Top Tiger Cologne?

The Bewitched Book is harmless and I suppose it fills a void somewhere in the publishing world. But the problem is that "Bewitched" itself lacked the campy kitsch that say, "The Brady Bunch" thrives on and would provide a reason for a book. Goofy kids in plaid bell bottoms were always more interesting than some witch twisting her nose anyway.

out to be universal truths. Though the characters in Singles pair off just a tad too perfectly, it leaves hope for the rest of us.

The actors in Singles make it one of the best acted films I've seen recently. The couples work because the chemistry between the actors work. Campbell Scott plays the nice guy without being plastic. Kyra Sedgwick has a way of working through her emotions without the theatrics.

Singles targets the college and post-college audiences in much the same way Fast Times did with high schoolers. It struck a nerve with me because I'm a sucker for happy endings in films that deserve them. Singles is one of those movies.

Cast your ballot with Redford's Candidate

By ADAM SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Correspondent

It's been done before. Actors leaving Hollywood's glitter for Washington D.C.'s power. Ronald Reagan is the most noticeable one. Clint Eastwood and Sonny Bono both ran for mayor in their respective cities. But guess who's decided to join the bunch by running in the California Democratic Primary for U.S. Senate: actor Robert Redford.

It may be hard to picture Redford as a political candidate today. However, if you turn the clock back to good 'ol 1972 by renting The Candidate this is exactly what you'll get.

The Candidate captures the young blond Redford with bushy Elvis-like sideburns. In addition, Redford's face is virtually wrinkle free unlike the '90s Redford face which has been captured recently on film in Sneakers, a film that may be able to launch Redford back into the mainstream of A-list stars. Redford is also currently profiled in the September issue of Esquire magazine.

Redford plays lawyer Bill McKay who believes every woman should have a right to a safe and legal abortion. With the click of the camera and a break for script changes, Redford's character is thrust into a campaign for a seat in California's Senate.

Redford appears in the film looking like Dan Quayle sporting sideburns, not too different than those worn by the stars of "Beverly Hills, 90210." Despite the similarities in appearance to our vice president, McKay is no dummy.

The movie should have been titled The Campaign because the story is more about how he campaigns than about his actual character. Another likely title could have been The Political Puppet, because McKay is being instructed how to answer questions and smile. He is also shown playing ball with kids to show that he can have fun outside the office.

Art mocks as well as imitates life in The Candidate. The Hollywood/Washington connection is shown by having fictional McKay meet real-life actress Natalie Wood. In another scene, a girl thrusts herself at McKay. The crowd is so excited to see McKay that it reminded me of when The Beatles landed at airports.

The chancellor had a very nice dinner for me. I really enjoyed every bit of it.

But you can't go around at my age saying "your life has changed." I go feed the same cats. Dealing with the same neighbors. I'm still trying to write a poem. It's as hard as it ever was. So I tell you, you would be better off asking my mother. But don't you dare. My mother would say, "ah, that's great." She would truly love it. Papers were calling her. My senior high school English teacher had a photo the size of a whole page in the newspaper. They interviewed her. They didn't call me.

So there has been some peripheral fun too.

Actually my dear, dear long-time friend the poet Charles Simic, who teaches over at UNH [University of New Hampshire] won the Pulitzer two years ago. So I remembered a little of the stuff he had told me. He said, "my God you hear from everybody." And it's true. Your phone goes nuts for a short time. Your mail goes wild for a short time. You hear from people you haven't heard from over 40 years ago.

In fact the Pulitzer Prize scared me. I thought, "you know, this is really great. I didn't expect this, but if it in any way gets in the way of my writing. That's going to be a sad thing. Because I am really happy with my writing now."

Do you look at your work?

I don't sit around reading my own books. But if I did, I probably would be saying, "gee, you seem kinda depressed here and here you don't." But I don't think that's an interesting issue for the writer. Moods are particularly transient.

When will your book be out?

I am not at all trying to rush it. No reason to. It's pretty close to being finished, but I want it to be right. The soonest will be a year and a half.

How do you pick your topics?

Least interesting part of the poet's job should be quote, "pick topic." You don't really pick topics. More interesting part is how and then you address them. You think, "well, all right this really interesting thing happened to me that will make a good poem." It doesn't work that way.

Language has to keep discovering the harder poem and you don't know where it is going to end up. But if you start out with an anecdote or an opinion, that's not interesting. What's interesting is just start somewhere and let the discovery continue. So a poem can be a series of discoveries. They start with a piece of language, almost something that seems almost beyond words. It is something you can't name. It is something that's haunting you; a feeling, a way of being.

How did you get involved in poetry?

Little bit of a mystery to me. I don't know. I guess one day I felt the urge to write a poem down and then I realized that it was going to take a while to do that. It is very exciting. It changed my life.

How old were you at the time?

I was 17 years old.

Where did you go to college?

I was an undergraduate at a little state school in Kansas and, then, I went to the University of Iowa for grad school.

What did you study?

Literature and philosophy. Well, I think I was faking it on the philosophy part. Ah, I concluded that after taking about 40 hours worth of classes. I realized I didn't understand about two-thirds of it. There were certain philosophers, who I guess you could say were more literary, and so I could enjoy. I like Schopenhauer, Kierkegaard. Delightful mad men. I took a year in a course in peripatetics philosophy.

What is that?

All the Greeks that came before Socrates-Epicurus, Thales, Anaximander.

I was mostly off doing my own reading all the time. Once I got started, I really discovered books in a serious way. And in my undergraduate school, I was lucky in that teachers just sort of let me alone. They knew I was working. Pretty sweet that way.

What poet do you look up to?

American poet William Carlos Williams. I felt he truly had the ear for American speech and modern life. I write very differently than him.

What advice would you give to college students?

First and foremost you should read everything, just everything. Just keep reading. The great thing about when you are young, when you start to read you find that one book really leads to another. You really don't have to have a teacher or somebody say, "I'll give you this reading," because all you gotta do is find one good book. You find that one good book. It's going to be telling you ought to be reading this other book in some way. That's how I experienced it.

Finally read anything of any quality there is. The great thing about a poet is everything is your business.

Eventually, it is important to find other people to show things to. Don't be interested in only your own work. You have gotta respect other poets.

You get humble when you look around. There is a lot of great writing out there.

I know this is a hard question, but how would you describe your writing?

I am open to a full range of emotions and range of expressions. And, they sometimes can exist within the same poem. I've always liked imagery that's always a part of it too. Creating something that does not quite exists before, and therefore makes you see something fresh and exciting. I don't dislike my work because that's as indulgent as sitting around saying it's wonderful. I don't think I am wonderful and I don't think I am horrible. I do think I have a lot of work I have to do, and I want to make it the best I can make it. That's always the point. Make it the best you can.

"That's too bad," was the reply Blattman said she received from the Continuing Education department and Health Services. Blattman contacted the Ombuds Office, who got the University to agree not to force her to pay the bill in the summer either.

"Mary Wardwell (the Assistant Ombudsperson) was the first person who really listened to what I said and didn't act like I was crazy," said Blattman.

"There's no set rules," said Blattman. "There's nothing you can't get around if you know the right people and the Ombuds Office knows the right people."

Blattman said she has learned that she has to struggle in the world and to question authority.

"Without the Ombuds Office, this whole thing would have gotten lost — the knots just get so high." said Blattman.

"Nothing is set in stone unless you let it be — and the Ombuds Office helps you get around positions," said Blattman. "It's a really great place to go."

Blattman said it's important for students not to accept University policy as the law, comparing the University to a big creature. "But it doesn't have to be."

conjunction with football games.

A group of University officials traveled to the University's first game of the year at Delaware, to see how the University of Delaware runs its popular tailgating events.

Tailgating practices at other schools including the University of Connecticut, Villanova, Holy Cross, and the University of New Hampshire were also studied by various University officials, including John Nitardy, director of athletic development.

University officials will monitor the experimental policy on a continuing basis as the football season progresses.

Perfect weekend for field hockey

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

All in all, you could say it was a pretty good weekend for the University of Massachusetts field hockey team.

On Saturday, the Minutewomen (5-0) upset No. 5 North Carolina 1-0 at Northeastern's Parsons Field, coming out strong in the first half and holding on after an early second half penalty corner goal by Ainslee Press.

UMass destroyed Bucknell 6-0, thanks to two-goal efforts by Press and Jenn Salisbury.

While Sunday's win was no surprise to anyone, Saturday's upset of the Tar Heels was the biggest win yet for the Minutewomen.

"Saturday's game was a really intense one," Press said. "We knew we were the underdogs going in, and I think that was an advantage because we had nothing to lose."

UMass controlled play for the first 20 minutes of the first half Saturday. North Carolina came back, fighting UMass tooth and nail the rest of the way and making life miserable for goalie Philippa Scott.

"Scottie had a great game," said UMass coach Pam Hixon. "We tried not to give up anything too dangerous, and when we did, she was right there to answer the call."

Hixon said her team rose to the occasion against the Tar Heels, who were without two players currently on national Under 21 field hockey teams.

"I knew I didn't have to worry about our team being ready to play," Hixon said. "We owned them for the first 20 minutes of the game, but we just couldn't bang it home. In the second half, the game evened out but we continued to execute well.

The UMass goal came at 28:22 in the second half when Holly Hockenbrock passed in on a penalty corner to Salisbury, who passed to Press for the goal. With the 1-0 lead, the Minutewomen simply held on for the remainder of the second half and grabbed an upset win.

Massachusetts came out just as strong on Sunday against the overmatched Bucknell squad, netting four goals in a span of 13 minutes. When Press missed the first of her two penalty stroke chances three minutes into the game, it looked like the game would be one missed scoring opportunities for UMass.

But at 30:20, Salisbury scored on a pass from Natalie Hart in the aftermath of a trick penalty corner by the team. Salisbury fought past the Bucknell defense all throughout the first half, putting in the rebound of a Danielle Borges' shot at 24:15 and giving the Minutewomen a 2-0 lead.

Press added two goals of her own, one on a blistering shot from just outside the circle, and another on a wrist shot on her second penalty stroke at 7:35 which made

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Display a positive attitude and an important relationship will turn around. A preoccupation with your health fades as you begin to feel better. Get out and socialize more.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Watch your step when dealing with hard-to-please authority figures. Projecting an aura of confidence will get you a front-row seat at an important meeting.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Change is inevitable. Starwise, there is no reason for you to fear the future. Although the love boat sails under cloudy skies at times, it will not sink. Have faith.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): It is time to rethink your priorities and review the direction your life is taking. Let past mistakes guide, not discourage, you. Newfound resources help you get a pet project launched.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You have more energy than in recent days. Tackle a complicated project you have been postponing. Protect a romantic dinner from interruptions or uninvited guests.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Avoid dwelling on a recent dispointment. Concentrate on winning - the odds are in your favor! Your personal appeal is at an all-time high. Plan a romantic interlude.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Financial worries can overshadow all other concerns. Refuse to fret about matters beyond your control. A chance encounter could lead to a protitable business venture!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Examine a relationship that is going nowhere. Thinking things through ensures that you will not jump to conclusions or rush off in the wrong direction.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Your new self-esteem enhances every aspect of your life. Review your goals before making any sudden moves. Family members should be consulted on domestic issues.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Better results will be obtained once you learn to go with the flow. A loophole will help you get out of a contract if you so desire. Listen to your conscience.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Your partner may be more vocal than usual today. Play the waiting game in both business and romance. If a legal matter reaches a stalemate, the delay could work in your favor.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A secret that is revealed now makes you whistle with surprise! Your luck changes for the better. Before buying a car or expensive jewelry, put some money away for a rainy day.

sideline for UMass, and drew the Rams goalie way out of position. Doyle led Edelman to the middle, where he took a shot on net. The ball came back out to Edgerly, who sent the ball back at net, and Johnson promptly put it past the diving URI goalie.

UMass' final goal was junior Randy Jacobs' fourth goal of the year, assisted by Steve Scott. It was icing on the cake, as UMass sealed the victory with Jacobs'goal.

the score 4-0 in UMass' favor.

The only question going into halftime was whether Press or Salisbury would net a hat trick first. Hixon spoiled things by clearing the bench to give youngsters some playing time.

Lewis, who saw last year's UMass squad jump out to an 8-0 record, said after playing against this Minutewomen team, the 1992 squad is better.

Asked if a Final Four appearance is possible for the Minutewomen, Lewis replied, "If they keep progressing like they are now, I won't be surprised seeing them there.

Chalmers a hidden golf star

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Staff

"There are a lot of hidden athletes at UMass," says Shawn Chalmers.

Truer words were never spoken. Their names are not Harper Williams or Don Caparotti, but Chalmers is indeed among them. You probably haven't heard of her, but the fifth-year senior Physical Education major and Amherst native is one of the premier female golf amateurs in New England, and she plies her trade for a school that hasn't fielded a women's golf team since 1984.

Chalmers was a freshman at the University of Hartford in 1988-89, then transferred to the University of Massachusetts the following year.

"I was really disappointed in the golf program [at Hartford]," Chalmers said. But why would she transfer to a university that dropped its golf program five years ago?

Her reasoning excluded golf; it strictly concerned academics.

"I thought I might as well come back here [to Amherst/UMass] and do it on my own and get the degree I want [in Physical Education] because Hartford didn't have a P.E. degree," Chalmers explained.

For the last three seasons, Chalmers has competed as an individual against the five-member teams fielded by schools in the region.

But it was during this summer that the former standout softball pitcher at Amherst High School shot her greatest lengths. Chalmers placed third in the New England Amateur Open (74-78-78) held from July 7-9 at the Crown Point Country Club in Springfield, Vermont. She topped the field the first day with a +2 performance before slipping to second in the middle day of competition and then to third on the final day.

"Wrong order," Chalmers sighed. It wasn't her only taste of success in recent months. She also earned a 10th place finish in the Eastern Amateur Open held at the Hermitage Country Club in Richmond, Virginia. Chalmers was in second place following Day 2, but a couple of bad holes on Day 3 dropped her eight spots.

After she graduates next Spring, Chalmers will move to West Palm Beach, Florida, and once she is settled, she must prepare for some stiff national competition in what is known in golf circles as "qualifying school."

This is a series of two annual tournaments where the top amateurs in the country square off seeking to earn their Tour Card, the ticket to a spot on the LPGA Tour. What does Chalmers think of her chances?

"I don't know, right now I need a lot of work," Chalmers said. "I have to find the right teacher. "

It's startling that Chalmers has enjoyed the success she has. She did not begin golfing seriously until she attended the University of Hartford. To that point, softball was her forte. But her family is full of avid golfers who drew her attention to the sport and she learned the game from David Twohig, resident professional at the Amherst Golf Club. She has never had a true coach. Can you think of a successful professional in any sport for whom the same can be said?

The Collegian prints nineteen thousand copies a day. It would take an awful long time to read that many newspapers. That's why most people around here read 'em nice and slow. One copy at a time.

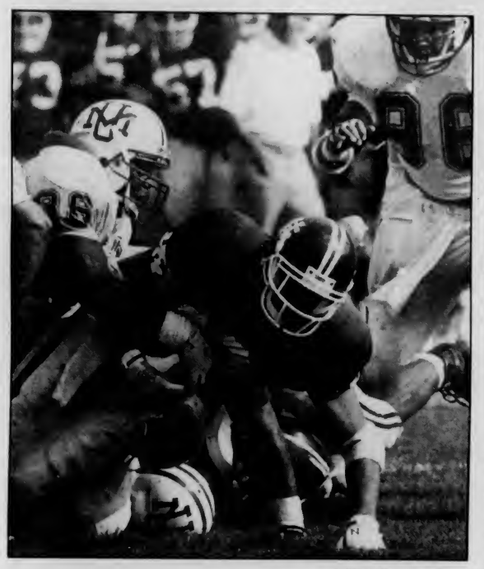
Minutemen beat Holy Cross for first win



CHRISTOPHER EVANS/ COLLEGIAN
The University of Massachusetts football team took home their first win of the season yesterday, as the defense came up big in the 7-3 victory over Holy Cross.

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

WORCESTER – Not many people gave the University of Massachusetts Football team much of a chance to beat the Holy Cross Crusaders Saturday at Fitton field.

The Crusaders, who lost last week to Army, were still considered one of the more imposing teams in division 1-AA but thanks to a monstrous defense and a never-say-die-attitude, the Minutemen squeaked out a 7-3 victory to snap the Cross' 26-game home unbeaten streak.

"This is a huge win for the UMass football program because a lot of people thought we were dead," said a bloodied and Gatorade covered, but elated head coach Mike Hodges. "The guys made play after play all day long, especially the defense, which did a great job and didn't panic at all."

Indeed the defense was the story as UMass scored their only points on a pass interception by nose guard Ben Albert at 8:49 of the first quarter. Holy Cross quarterback Andy Fitzpatrick dropped back for a screen pass on his own 20 yard line, but the UMas defense rushed the play and Albert picked off the wobbly pass, lumbering 17 yards for the Mass TD.

"We were looking for a screen on third down - luckily, that's the play they ran," said Albert. "I just happened to be in the right place at the right time."

Holy Cross' only points of the day came at the beginning of the fourth quarter after Orlando Cepero took the ball at his own 44, bounced off a tackle and broke down the right side to the Massachusetts 13 yard line.

The UMass defense was like a stone wall, though, as they held the Crusaders to a 32-yard field goal by Anthony Pignio to cut the deficit to four. Fortunatly for UMass, those were the last points Holy Cross would score.

Playing big for the Minutemen were defensive tackle Brian Corcoran, who had 11 tackles including one sack, outside linebacker Scott Assencoa (8 tackles), and inside linebacker Phil Latrigue (game high 12 tackles). It was outside linebacker Mario Perry (three sacks) who came up the biggest late in the game, when, with the Crusaders threatening to score (3:38 left in the game), he sacked Fitzpatrick for a loss on third down. In desperation, Holy Cross went for it on fourth and 24, and again it was Perry who outran his defender and sacked Fitzpatrick to seal the victory for the Minutemen.

"Their quarterback wasn't that mobile and I just caught up to him," said Perry. "This victory feels great, though, especially since the Holy Cross team was so cocky and thought they would win easily coming into the game."

On offense, redshirt freshman Rene Ingoglia led the rushing attack with 19 rushes for 70 yards as well as the pass receiving attack with two receptions for 11 yards. Ingoglia replaced the injured Johnny Johnson midway through the second quarter and was a workhorse the rest of the game.

Holy Cross had other chances to score, however. At the start of the second quarter, with the ball on the UMass 10, Fitzpatrick rolled left and chose to keep the ball. He was hit just short of the goalline and fumbled in the endzone where the ball was pounced on by UMass' John Creamer.

In the third quarter, they kept the ball for over five minutes, getting the ball as far as the UMass 23 yard line. On fourth down, the Cross line was called for illegal procedure, pushing the ball back five yards where they attempted a 36 yard field goal which fell short and to the right.

UMass downs Rams 3-1 in comeback win

Sports legend Yogi Berra once said,"It ain't over til it's over."

Living by that quote, the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team stormed back against the University of Rhode Island Saturday, capturing a 3-1 win in overtime.

As the first half came to a close, the Minutemen found themselves down 1-0 to the Rams. After coming out flat, UMass could not get anything going, and Rhode Island took advantage midway through the half.

At the half, UMass head coach Sam Koch gave the team an inspirational talk, leading to the second half comeback.

"At halftime, after Coach Koch yelled at us we got our mind set back into the game. We picked it up in the second half," said junior Matt Edgerly, who returned after a prolonged injury.

Rhode Island did not have any dangerous chances for the remainder of the game, which led to UMass' first goal.

With 1:30 left to go in the game, junior Justin Edelman connected on his third goal of the season, tying the game at 1-1, off a pass from junior co-captain Shawn Bleau.

"I was thinking about the bus ride home at that point, considering it was so late in the game. We were knocking at the door all game, just looking for that one break to score," said Edelman.

Bleau took a pass from Edgerly and flicked the ball in front of the box. Edelman then isolated the URI goalie, effortlessly booting it into the net.

"We were pounding away throughout the second half, and we really dominated the rest of the game. Once we scored, I knew we were going to win it in overtime," said junior co-captain Todd Kylish.

The first goal by UMass sent the game into overtime, which the Minutemen dominated. The winning goal was scored three minutes into the first overtime period by freshman Colin Johnson, his second goal of the year, unassisted.

Caparotti a jack-of-all-trades

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

WORCESTER, Mass. — On the same field where Gordie Lockbaum honed his two-way play for Holy Cross in the late 1980's, Don Caparotti began his for the University of Massachusetts on Saturday.

Caparotti, a senior from Damascus, MD, added wideout to his ever expanding resume, lining up for two plays there in the Minutemen's 7-3 win over Holy Cross this weekend.

Donny's a great athlete. He could probably play anywhere," UMass head coach Mike Hodges said. "As long as he keeps playing the way he did today, we'll let him play anywhere he wants."

Normally the Minutemen's starting cornerback and punt returner, Caparotti recently added kickoff returns to his repertoire, putting him on the field for 103 plays in Saturday's defensive battle at Fitton Field.

"I don't mind it at all," Caparotti said. "Don't get me wrong, you get tired out there but if you can manage it [playing both ways], it's fun."

Although Caparotti didn't catch a pass during his brief stint at wideout, don't count out seeing number 31 lining up on offense in future UMass games.

"You may see more of it," Hodges said. "Donny's got great speed, he's a threat with the ball and we are going to try and get it to him on offense."

"They've been trying to get me to play there [wide reciever] for about three years now," Caparotti said. "Today we finally did it."

Playing wide reciever is nothing new to Caparotti, who starred in that slot at Damascus High School, earning All-County honors while drawing the attention of numerous Division-1A scouts.

Up until now, Caparotti's only chance to showcase his offensive talents have come in the form of punt returns, a category Caparotti finshed fourth in the country in last season with a 13.7 yard-per-return average.

After a slow start last week against a powerful Delaware squad (2 returns for 18 yards), Caparotti fielded three punts on Saturday, taking one Jeff Meader offering 26 yards before a touchdown-saving tackle by Pat Smith.

On the defensive side of the ball, Caparotti had six tackles (four unassissited) including a key stop late in the third quarter with the Crusaders threatening at the UMass 33-yard line on fourth and one.

"On a play like that, I'm supposed to contain and keep the guy inside." Caparotti said. "He [Holy Cross tailback Eric Sampson] tried to go outside and it's either make the play or get yelled at by the coaches."

In addition Caparotti grabbed his second interception of the season (12th of his career, putting him in a tie for fourth in the UMass record books with Ron Harris) on a Andy Fitzpatrick hail mary pass with time running out in the first half.

However, Caparotti's finest moment of Saturday's win may have been the bonecrushing, highlight-film hit he placed on Holy Cross flanker Scott Moody early in the first quarter.

"That was a 'Welcome to UMass football' shot," Caparotti said "On a play like that, I knew a guy was going to be in that spot and you sort of forget about the interception and go for the kill shot."

A legitimate All-American candidate at the cornerback position, Caparotti's blazing speed and pure athleticism should draw the attention of pro scouts, and come next August Caparotti could find himself fighting for a job in an NFL training camp.

Vietnam vets may still be in Laos, Russia

By WILLIAM M. WELCH
and CLINTON O'BRIEN
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Two of Richard Nixon's Pentagon chiefs told a congressional panel Monday that the government believed American airmen were left alive in Laos and not returned at the end of the Vietnam War.

Separate testimony by Melvin R. Laird and James R. Schlesinger, both of whom served as President Nixon's secretary of defense two decades ago, supported conclusions by leaders of the Senate investigating committee that not all Americans came home at the war's end.

"I think it's quite extraordinary when two former secretaries of defense both give evidence documenting that they had information, or they believed personally, that people were alive and not accounted for in Operation Homecoming," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., chairman of the Select Committee on POW-MIA Affairs.

"They have acknowledged publicly that there was evidence people did not come back who should have, that they were held prisoner to the best of our knowledge," Kerry said.

Laird and Schlesinger appeared as the panel began the first ever under-oath, public questioning of the highest ranking officials of the Nixon administration about their efforts to win release of American POWs as they negotiated an end to the long, bitter war in Southeast Asia.

In other POW news, the American co-chairman of a joint POW commission urged Russia on Monday to flatly declare that it is no longer holding American serviceman and warned that U.S. patience is running out.

Malcolm Toon said he had no evidence that American POWs were alive in the Soviet Union. He acknowledged that an aide to his Russian co-chairman, reformist historian Gen. Dmitri Volkogonov, said recently that Russia had no live American POWs. That statement, he said, "wasn't sufficiently specific."

"Above all I want a clearer statement from the Russian government that there is no live American POW held in detention in Russian facilities," Toon, a former U.S. ambassador to Moscow, told reporters.

Toon did not specify what was wrong with the aide's statement, but he apparently wants something unequivocal from the highest levels.

Toon issued the demand at the start of a weeklong meeting in Moscow of the Russian-American Bilateral Commission on POWs.

Both sides have praised the panel for fostering cooperation among the former Cold War adversaries. So far it has produced little, other than a list of several dozen U.S. civilians trapped in the Soviet Union after World War II.

Students and enforcers find mace to be valuable

"I wouldn't hesitate to use my mace, if I was being attacked or harassed," said an unnamed first year student.

She carries mace for self-protection. It makes her feel safe walking to classes or around campus at night. "The University of Massachusetts is a big campus. And, it is dangerous to walk alone without having at least some form of self-defense to use against an attacker."

Veronica Frenkel, the coordinator of educator-advocates against violence against women at the Every Women's Center, said women need to protect and empower themselves not just on the streets, but also when they are on dates or at parties.

"I encourage women to chose a method of self-defense they feel most comfortable with, " Frenkel said.

According to Frenkel, some methods are taking self-defense or assertive training classes, others are carrying mace or a whistle.

"Women must remember these methods are protective measures and not preventive measures," Frenkel said. If a woman does get attacked or raped she should not feel guilty, because the most important

College students are not the only ones carrying mace or Pepperguard for protection against assaulters. The Amherst Police Chief Donald Maia decided to start arming his officers with the the spray derived from cayenne peppers last week.

"The oleoresin capsicum (OC) spray is a better alternative to striking a subject who is physically resisting an officer with a nightstick because it is more humane," Maia said.

War causing sickness?

Strange symptoms affecting soldiers

By JONATHAN YENKIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Frank Landry, an Army reserve sergeant, says he was a healthy, energetic person before he served in the Gulf War.

Now he says he suffers from frequent fatigue, shortness of breath, chronic diarrhea, sores across his body and pain in his stomach. Landry is not sure what is causing his maladies, but a congressional panel wants to know whether it was something from the war.

"This is a system supposed to protect all involved," said Landry, 29, of Nashua, N.H., "This is unacceptable."

Landry and several other Gulf War veterans testified Tuesday before the House Committee on Veterans Affairs. Last week, the committee heard testimony from Pentagon officials in Washington who said they were seeking explanations for the ailments.

Military officials have found no evidence linking soldiers' health problems to oil fires in Kuwait, and they say medicines administered to protect against biological weapons and nerve gas were safe.

But U.S. Rep. Joseph Kennedy, D-Mass., a member of the committee, said he was unconvinced.

Referring to Vietnam veterans who complained about medical problems after being exposed to the herbicide Agent Orange, Kennedy said, "we can't let history repeat itself."

"None of us here want to wait another five, 10 or 15 years for the answer to the 'Gulf War Syndrome,'" Kennedy said.

For hundreds of veterans, common ailments include bleeding gums, aching joints and hair loss.

Venus Hammack, a staff sergeant in the Army reserve, said she has random attacks of asthma and dysentery. She also has suffered prolonged bleeding on several occasions.

Librarian claims malice in termination process

Speyer Svetlana, a University of Massachusetts library assistant for the past 18 years, said she was "kicked out" of her job in the Reserves department and escorted out by her boss yesterday morning.

"(My boss) told me to pack my bags," Svetlana said. "I'm so scared, it's overwhelming. I feel so out of control."

When she showed up for work yesterday, her boss told her she was expected to be at work the previous night to begin her new shift change and that she was not supposed to be there.

Svetlana was notified in a Sept. 3 memo that her 8 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. shift was being changed to the 2-10 p.m. evening shift.

"It's so intense to put 18 years of your life into that place, even if they didn't have any other daytime hours to offer me — which they do," Svetlana said. "I can't get a handle on it because they have been so flexible when hiring new people."

Svetlana is aware that the Library is hiring new people for daytime hours. Svetlana, 52, a single mother, sent her boss a memo explaining that she could not work the evening shift, because she did not want to neglect her 15 year-old daughter. Her regular hours have been from 8 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. for the past 18 years.

"She [Svetlana's daughter] is scared to be home alone at night," Svetlana said. "She cries. I'm really scared to leave her alone."

In a memo Svetlana sent her boss dated Sept. 14, she said the reassignment to evening supervisor in the reserves department would impose a hardship on her family and health.

The memo stated that her family responsibilities "which require stability and support," her father's terminal diagnosis, status as a single parent and provider as well as her own "precarious health" make it impossible to accept the position.

The memo continued: "Three previous reassignments have contributed signifi-

• A woman living in John Quincy Adams reported damage to her door and lock on Monday just before 2 a.m. Apparently pennies had been wedged between the door and frame, according to police. A penny had been glued to the lock.

A locksmith had to be summoned to recore the lock. The damage was estimated at $100.

• A man reported extensive damage to his automobile on Sunday afternoon. Parked in Lot 49, the car had been broken into and the steering column was damaged, according to police. Damage was estimated at $300.

• On Sunday afternoon, a man reported that a telephone, clock, cassette tapes and sunglasses had been stolen from his room in Mackimmie Dormitory. The estimated damage was $300.

Arson a burning issue in Lawrence

LAWRENCE (AP) — Weary from battling a dozen fires over a four-day period, fire officials say the current surge of fires are suspicious.

The latest fire broke out Monday in East Haverhill, about 9:45 a.m. in a first floor kitchen, said Lawrence Fire Department Deputy Lt. Edward Leonar.

"So far, we've been just barely managing," Leonard said. "If we have multiple-alarm fires, we rely on mutual aid and call back most of our people.

There have been more than 120 cases of arson in the city this year. Ten of the fires that broke out over the weekend were suspicious in nature, Leonard said.

"We didn't have to have mutual aid, but we were getting pretty close to it at that point," Deputy Edward Leonard said.

There was a three-alarm fire in what had been a medical office building on Haverhill Street at 9 p.m. Sunday.

At least five Lawrence fire fighters were injured during the weekend.

Carlos Colon, 32, of Lawrence was arrested on arson charges in connection with a four-alarm fire that gutted a vacant apartment house. Two fire fighters were hurt battling the blaze. One suffered broken ribs and the other heat exhaustion.

The fire was set in the rear of a former market in South Lawrence at 10:13 p.m. Saturday. Damage was confined to the outside of the building.

A blaze that officials said was set was discovered in the hallway of an apartment building on May Street at 11:29 p.m. Damage was minor and no one was injured.

At 1 a.m. Sunday, fire fighters responded to a two-alarm fire of suspicious origin in a vacant triple decker. The building was destroyed.

Ten minutes later, a fire was set outside the Arlington School, a public school for kindergarten through the eight grade. It was quickly doused.

And at 1:18 a.m., a house fire was reported in an apartment building. Damage from the blaze, believed to have been started in a mattress, was confined to one room.

The roof of a warehouse at the Jackson Lumber Co. was damaged by a three-alarm fire at 7:30 a.m. Sunday, officials said. An investigation was started to determine the cause.

Plane loses wing flap

BOSTON (AP) — Federal Aviation Administration officials are investigating what caused a Delta jetliner to lose a piece of a front wing flap as it approached Logan Airport.

"The pilots were not sure what happened," said James Barnhart, district director of marketing for the airline. "It did not have any direct effect on the landing."

FAA officials recovered the flap and investigators were sent to the airport early Monday morning, said Jean Mullins, a spokesperson for the Federal Aviation Administration.

The 12-foot by 3-foot section of what is called the leading edge flap fell into a grove of trees about 40 yards from the Southeast Expressway at Neponset in the city's Dorchester section Sunday night.

Police said no one was hit with the debris.

The leading edge flap provides more airlift and allows planes to fly at slower speeds when approaching landings, Mullins said.

The aircraft is currently at a Delta airline hanger, Mullins said.

Federal Transportation Safety Board authorities have also been contacted by the FAA, she said.

Police fire on crowd of 300

By RUDY GONZALEZ
Associated Press

SANTO DOMINGO, Dominican Republic — Plainclothes policemen fired on 300 people marching to protest upcoming quincentennial celebrations, and police said a human rights activist was killed and two other protesters were wounded.

The shootings Sunday evening were the first violence connected to government plans to commemorate Christopher Columbus' arrival in 1492. Critics have said the celebrations, including construction of a giant lighthouse, are wasting millions of dollars.

The nation's police chief, Gen. Rafael Guerrero Peralta, said a police lieutenant and two agents were under investigation in the shootings and could face prosecution.

Police said Rafael Efrain Ortiz, a lawyer who headed the Dominican Committee of Human Rights, was shot to death. The two wounded protesters were not immediately identified by police.

Ramon Almanzar, leader of the leftist Popular Organizations Collective, said Ortiz was shot in the head when he chanted "Columbus! You're Not Welcome Here!"

The protest, named the "Cimarrona march" after a colonial-era escaped slave, attracted 300 people, including artists and community leaders who have publicly criticized the October celebrations.

The Popular Organizations Collective and other groups have scheduled a series of protests during the 500th anniversary celebrations Oct. 9-12. The celebrations coincide with the visit of Pope John Paul II to the Dominican Republic to open the Latin American Episcopal Conference.

John Paul II will lead a Mass at the Columbus Lighthouse on Oct. 11, but will not attend government celebrations on Oct. 9 and on Oct. 12.

Government critics accuse President Joaquin Balaguer of glorifying Columbus. They acknowledge the explorer's accomplishments, but also note his support of slavery and subjugation and extermination of Indians.

3-year rest over for CATE guide

By GEORGE A. N. CHIDI JR.
Collegian Correspondent

Emerging from a three year hibernation, the Course/Teacher Evaluation (CATE) guide has been re-awakened here at the University by the Student Government Association, using 1989 reviews of classes and professors.

The CATE guide is composed of student's reviews of various professors and courses, as well as a directory of services, places and things around the Amherst area, according to the guide.

"The reviews enclosed are taken from actual student forms, we hope that we have done a fair job of presenting them," said former UMass student and CATE guide publisher, Brian Crawford.

The guide has not been published since 1989 because of problems with getting information about classes and instructors, according to SGA treasurer, Tracy A. O'Connell. "Professors are not required to submit to evaluation," said O'Connell.

Information for the reviews were taken from the end-of-semester evaluations used for the 1989 CATE guide, O'Connell said. The SGA used "what we had available."

The CATE guide offers "over 100 course evaluations." There are 1,971 courses open to undergraduates here, according to the office of the Registrar.

"For the most part, the guide is accurate for hard-science courses as opposed to, say, the history of Russia, because the curriculum doesn't change," said O'Connell.

O'Connell said she hopes eventually every course will be evaluated, and that the Academic Affairs committee of the SGA will get faculty viewpoints on the guide. She added that she would like to see the directory upgraded, and a coupon section added.

Although O'Connell expressed interest and concern about maintaining accuracy of the CATE guide, she was worried about professors' reaction to negative reports.

Only five reviews from the English department tell nothing about the program to incoming freshmen, said Charlotte K. Spivak, a professor of English, who reviewed in the guide.

Spivak was reviewed for a course taught in spring 1989, Major British Writers. Spivak said it is unfortunate the reviews are several years old, and a professor's improvements may not be reflected in the old evaluations. She added that she will not be teaching the course this year.

A much larger sampling of the department would be helpful to students, she said. "I've always taken it for granted that professors receive end-of-course evaluations," Spivak said.

"If my main role was to get a good CATE guide review, I could," said Phillips R. Jones, professor of physics and the instructor of Introduction to Physics I, evaluated in the guide.

According to the guide, a substantial majority of his students would not recommend the course or Jones, with the bulk of the complaint relating to the exams and grading policies.

"I know how to get good grades for hard problems," Jones said. "I would just show exactly the same problem in discussion, and reproduce the problem on the exam. It would be nice to update the guide to see if I made some progress."

Leaders pleased with tailgating reinstatement

By TAMI MONAHAN
and DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Students and administrators have applauded the decision to lift the ban on alcohol at outdoor events on a limited, experimental to allow for tailgating at football games.

The ban was instituted in 1988 by former Chancellor Joseph Duffey. Duffey's decision to revise the campus' alcohol policies was made after several investigations into the Southwest riot which followed the 1986 World Series.

The decision to ban tailgating was specifically related to problems with those events, according to Dan Melley, vice-chancellor of University relations and development.

"The elimination of tailgating was due to abuse of tailgating," said Melley.

"We ask everyone to cooperate," Melley said. "[The policy] is going to be reviewed. It is an experiment. If there are a lot of abuses it will be shut down again."

"I think we ought to try it and give it a chance," Melley said. "It shouldn't be a drinking contest. It should be a fun thing."

Director of Development for the Athletic Department John Nitardy said, "It sets up a nice atmosphere around football. It is an outdoor event and a social event and this creates a better opportunity for people to come out an enjoy their entire Saturday afternoon.

"It is important for my office because it will help to bring alumni back to the games. It gives them a chance to enjoy some comradery with friends and classmates."

Nitardy also cited the need for cooperation from those tailgating.

"We need people to come out and treat this as a privilege," Nitardy said. "They can't just come out expecting to party and not act responsibly because the privilege will be taken away immediately. This is on a trial basis and if people can not police themselves then it will be gone.

Student Trustee Kevin Newnan cited the role of the Student Government Association in "getting the ball rolling." He said the SGA passed a motion last semester in favor of tailgating and from there David Gagne, former SGA president, worked with administrators and staff to create a new policy.

"This institution as a whole needs to lighten up," said Newman. He also said that he felt tailgating would help promote campus identification and spirit.

Newman said he wasn't very concerned about considerations of safety.

"On the whole UMass students and particularly alumni are a responsible bunch," Newnan said. "It's very successful at other schools. It needs to be handled in a safe, open manner."

Senior History major Michael Aylward thinks the new alcohol policy will likely bring more students to football

UMass selected to hold summer science camp

By University Press Reports

The University of Massachusetts is one of three schools nationwide, that was selected by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services to create a five-week, regional summer Science Enrichment Program for high school students from disadvantaged backgrounds.

"It's our hope," said Frederick W. Byron, dean of the UMass Faculty of Natural Sciences and Mathematics, "that this summer program will help some promising high school students to further develop their talents and better understand the vital role of science and mathematics in the world."

The aim of the program is to show students from minority groups, including students of any color from geographical areas where opportunities are limited or non-existent, the excitement and career possibilities in biomedical science.

UMass will receive up to $2,000,000 for four years to run the program. The University of Kentucky and the University of Southern California were the other two schools selected by HHS.

The summer Science Enrichment Program was conceived and will be managed by the National Cancer Institute (NCI).

The innovative project is based on a two-year pilot study originally sponsored by NCI in 1990 and 1991 at Hood College in Frederick, Maryland.

Approximately 250 nationally selected students lived in dormitories during the summer sessions at Hood College. Their varied ethnic backgrounds included Alaskan Native, American Indian, Asian refugee, African-American, Hispanic, Native Hawaiian, American Samoan and white students mostly from Appalachia.

"We are currently looking for 50 promising high school students from New England and upper New York state," said mathematics professor Donald St. Mary, principal investigator for the grant. "We have already sent out over 400 information packets to schools and state agencies throughout the Northeast.

To be eligible, he explained, students should be entering the tenth grade in the fall, strongly motivated and recommended by two teachers.

"The pilot project demonstrated that students who participated in the summer Science Enrichment Program showed increased interest in taking science courses," said St. Mary.

"Our program will provide classroom and laboratory experiences in subjects such as chemistry, mathematics, physics, biology, computer science and language arts," St. Mary said. The students will also

Professor appointed

Francis to be chairman for council

By KELLY GEERS
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts professor Frederick "Jack" Francis, professor emeritus of food science and nutrition, was appointed in May as Chairman of the Board of Directors for the American Council on Science and Health (ACSH) for a three-year-term.

Francis hopes to use his appointment to bring science into the mainstream.

"Somebody has to be a voice for good science in this country," Francis said. "We are seeing legislation being driven by public emotion, not science."

The ACSH, based in New York City, was formed about 50 years ago. It is a consumer and health oriented organization that publishes articles and brochures on major health problems, such as AIDS and smoking, facing America today. They rely on individual contributions, and donations from industries and institutes for their funding.

Francis received his Ph.D. in Food Science and Technology from UMass in 1954, and joined the University's faculty in the September of that year.

During the 36 years he taught, Francis received many honors including the 1990 Chancellor's Medal, the highest honor at UMass for resident faculty.

In addition, he received countless awards for distinguished service and the Outstanding Scientist in his field award.

Francis is an expert in food components, processing, safety and quality. He has written 310 technical papers, seven books, and given over 300 lectures and presentations.

He says the level of smoking goes down as it relates to education level — as the degree of smoking goes up, the degree of education goes down.

Francis believes, "without question," that smoking is worse than all the public health threats combined. "Slowly America has changed its attitude about smoking," Francis said. "It has been a long, slow change, and we will never be a smoke-free society."

Among its priorities, the ACSH will be pushing for AIDS research.

"This country has a moral obligation to put as much money into finding a cure for AIDS as we can," Francis said. "Background research for AIDS is going ahead by leaps and bounds. We are going to see a vaccine within the next ten years.

thing is she managed to survive, Frenkel believes.

According to the Amherst Chief of Police Donald Maia, there are two different types of tear gas both of which last no longer than 45 minutes. He said one type is mace which is a chemical agent that produces a temporarily blinding gas.

He said another type is oleoresin capsicum (OC) spray which is an inflammatory agent found in cayenne peppers. "The cayenne spray has a stronger solution and is more effective," Maia said.

UMass Police Lieutenant Stephen Warren said it was a painful, anxiety filled experience when he voluntarily got sprayed with the cayenne pepper solution during his training session.

"Your eyes immediately close up, you can only breath through your nose because your mucous membranes in your throat and mouth are inflammed and you sneeze a little too," Warren said.

Charles Dimare, the directing attorney at UMass legal services, said to purchase mace or Pepperguard in Massachusetts a person needs to apply for a fire arm identification card at a police department in the town they have declared residency.

"If a person is caught carrying mace without an F.I.D. card on their first offense, they will get fined $500 or get up to one year in jail," Dimare said. "And, on their second offense they will get fined $1000 and get up to two years in jail."

Dimare advises students to go through a training program on how to use mace and to educate themselves on when it is appropriate and legal to use it. "It is okay to use mace if you are assaulted. But you could have a libel suit on your hands, if you spray someone, who just called you a name," Dimare said.

Michelle Laflamme, manager of the Amherst Drop Zone in Hadley, said the store has a booming business with mace and Pepperguard. "Our store has sold hundreds and hundreds of cans of both tear gases this year," Laflamme said.

Laflamme said most people, who buy mace at the Amherst Drop Zone, are women of college age. In the Collegian a recent mace advertisement from Lorre Enterprises attempted to tap into the abundent resource of potential mace customers with an ad that read, "Accuracy is not essential. Just aim, spray and walk away."

Women are not the only ones who carry mace on campus. Chris Ragusa, an undeclared sophomore, said he also decided to get mace for protection. "I am afraid of running into a drunk fraternity boy who wants to pick a fight with me," Ragusa said.

He said mace is better than a knife or gun because it is more humane. "I would rather have an attacker endure the pain of mace for 45 minutes, than to see him or her bleed to death because of a gun shot wound."

participate in special seminars, group research projects, and visits to research centers as well as some cultural field trips.

"We are going to offer students the chance to work with research faculty doing experiments, and help them actually learn how scientists and the scientific method works," he added.

"Students will learn how to do sophisticated procedures such as studying cell cultures, designing experiments and programming computers," St. Mary said. "We are going to do lots of hands-on experiments."

Illegal chemicals found on their way to Syria

By RUTH SINAI
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The United States has blocked a shipment of chemicals from India to Syria and complained to Indian authorities that the material was designed to manufacture chemical weapons, a U.S. official said today.

As soon as the United States found out the substances had been loaded onto a German ship for transport to Syria, it asked Germany's government to intervene, said an official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

German authorities tracked the ship and learned it had unloaded its cargo in Cyprus last month, from where it was supposed to be loaded onto another vessel bound for Syria, said the official.

Germany ordered the chemicals be put back on the German ship and returned to India, he added.

The Indian company that sold the chemical — United Phosphorous of Bombay — said it was told the trimethyl phosphite was bound for a civilian plant, according to The New York Times, which first reported the matter in today's edition.

The Times quoted a company director, who asked not to be named, as saying the firm had sold 90 tons of the chemical to Syria earlier this year as the first installment of a bigger sale. Syria then pestered the company to provide the second half, "day in and day out," the director was quoted as saying.

U.S. officials constantly grapple with cases in which other countries sell chemicals deemed of "dual use," that is, they can be used for fertilizers or industrial compounds or to manufacture weapons.

To solve the problem, the United States and its allies have put together a list of chemicals thought to be essential ingredients for chemical weapons, and have urged producing countries to regulate export of these substances.

Syria is known to have a full-fledged chemical weapons arsenal, including artillery shells and bombs. Israeli officials in the past have warned that Syria also has the capacity to load chemical warheads onto medium range missiles that could reach Israel's heartland

The commission "must start producing results, because the American public is getting awfully impatient," Toon said. Members of POW organizations and the American legion complained last summer about the lack of progress

"The feeling back home is that this exercise is not doing very much," he said.

■ effective

He said the effects of OC spray last from 10 to 45 minutes and can cause the victim to panic because they can't see and they have a hard time breathing due to their swelled mucous membranes.

"Just try to imagine someone throwing a handful of pepper into your eyes and I think you'll get an idea of why the spray hurts," Maia said.

According to Maia, OC spray is considered an alternative use of force and is not intended to replace a firearm, service baton or self defense techniques.

"I've been looking into the pros and cons of using the OC spray for about a year," Maia said. "And, I thought it seemed like a positive thing to use, because it might save people from any lasting physical harm."

He said his officers all went through a training program on how and when to use the spray and how to stop the effects of the spray once a subject has been subdued.

UMass Police Lieutenant Stephen Warren said to ease the effects of OC spray the person can dunk his or her head into water or face themselves toward a breeze of air.

"The person must make sure after dunking their head into water they don't redunk themselves into the same bucket because they will get re-exposed to the pepper spray," Warren said.

Warren said in order for the spray to be effective it must be shot from 1-4 feet away and be aimed directly into the person's face. "Usually a 1-4 second burst of spray is all a person needs to knock down their assaulter."

Maia said variations of OC have been used in pharmacology and for food spicing for years. He said since OC is a non-lethal, soft deterrent, it is emerging as an alternative weapon for law enforcement.

Evangelist's theological blather: is it flimflam or fact?

The voice, electronically magnified, came booming at me.

"If I had a cure for cancer, I would share it with those who have cancer!!! I've found Jesus and I want to help those who have not."

Usually, I try to avoid the Rally Du Jour on the Student Union steps, but how could I not stop and listen to our very own campus evangelist?

Cliffe Knechtle was our UMass version of Jim Bakker for three days last week. He's not your everyday preacher, no sir-ree. He's a bona fide high-tech enlightener.

With video cameras blazing and a wireless P.A. system, Knechtle did his best to poke and prod students into believing his theological clap-trap.

You must have seen his posters: "Can you prove the existence of God?", "Is Christianity a crutch for the weak?", "Doesn't the Bible contradict itself?", (and my favorite) "Why does God allow evil and suffering?"

Answers: No, yes, yes, yes, and because there is no such entity as "God".

Don't miss understand me: I'm a true supporter of everyone's freedom of religion, but Knechtle and people like him are open to criticism, especially when they spout blatant hypocrisy while blocking my path into the Student Union.

On the second day of his sermon/lecture, he picked up a newspaper and quoted himself from a corresponding article.

"I never said that," denied Knechtle, claiming the reporter had gotten his quote wrong.

"What he claimed I said, doesn't make sense," he yelled while holding the paper.

Well, I was there on the first day, sorry Cliffe, you did say exactly what the article recalled.

David
RIVERA

Basically all three days were a test to see how many times Knechtle could contradict himself. I stopped counting at 100.

Phony preachers are like crack dealers, who give you a little sample to get you hooked. Similarly, these mediators with God give false hope to line their bank accounts.

More people have died and suffered due to religion than any war, famine, or natural disaster combined. This is documented history.

The Crusades, starting in 1095, took hundreds of years and millions of lives before the Papal fathers were satisfied.

Let us not forget the Spanish Inquisition. If you didn't conform or repent you were either boiled alive or slowly dismembered, all in the name of God.

In 1536, Hank VIII wanted a new wife but Rome said, "No way, dude." Stuck with a wife he didn't want, he had no choice but to chop off her head and split from the Roman church, creating his own branch of religion: the Church of England. Taadaaa! Protestantism was born.

Knechtle accused some people of being "atheists," as if it was a dirty word. That word lumps you into one of two categories: believers or nonbelievers. If you're looking to believe in something, then don't look to a false God for salvation. Definitely don't look to quacks like Knechtle.

Inherently evil, religion is like walking into a well stocked supermarket; so much to choose from with no idea, if you'll like it.

You've got Roman Catholicism, Protestantism, Lutheranism, Franciscans, Baptists, Fundamentalists, Mormons, Shakers, Quakers, Pentecostals, Methodists, Evangelists, born-again Christians, Muslims, Judaism, Hinduism, Buddhism, Voodooism, the list goes on and on.

Friday was Knechtle's last day on campus, and once again I walked by and listened. He was in serious debate with a student. Back and forth they went. Then in an awkward moment for all listening, Knechtle tried to convince the young fellow that present-day abortion clinics are as atrocious as the Nazi death camps of World War II.

"My grandparents are death camp survivors," the young student emotionally replied. "I can't believe you said that. You have no idea what you're talking about," ended the student, sadly shaking his head in disgust.

The crowd fell silent waiting for one of Knechtle's crafty replies — he had none.

Don't exit stage left — U.S. has the leading role

As the inexorable presidential campaign progresses with the verve and excitement of a charging glacier, and the Animal Rights Coalition salvos intellectual fireworks charged with wet powder, we turn once again to parry and riposte with baited lucidity on the Op/Ed page. I should think it is suitable to begin a new year with some speculations on the new age of international relations, the age of the Pax Americana.

We are presented with a unique opportunity to learn from history and to be the instrument of a new world, where dispute among nations is solved on the bargaining table, rather than on the battlefield. Of course, the Liberal Left, adherents of the ostrich approach to real politics, would have us hide behind our oceans and withdraw from the global scene.

Stefan
GROSS

Selective perception combined with deliberate ignorance often presents to us this kind of impractical idealistic philosophy. It is in the interest of not only our country, but all countries, to set the world right after four decades of Cold War. When international order is threatened, the United States must take a pivotal role in effecting stability.

The United States is the only nation with a sharp enough spear and a long enough haft to project power, both financial and military, on a global scale.

Events in the Persian Gulf proved that regional economic power, such as Japan and the European Community possess, does not directly translate into the power to protect national interests, when they are threatened.

The Iran debacle of the Carter presidency aptly illustrates the danger of the emasculation of military deterrence combined with financial appeasement to effect domestic stop gaps.

Our way of life is in no small way reliant on small trade. If we wish to continue in gaining the benefits of an international economy, we must continue to play a leading role in the affairs of the world.

What should be the instrument of American policy? Such a discussion resurrects images of Vietnam, a spectre kept in tomes by the Liberal Left, who conveniently forget the role of Kennedy and Johnson. Working with both regional powers and global partners, through the United Nations and back channels, both the persuasiveness of economic opportunity and the coerciveness of the multilateral dragoon should be employed as the situation warrants.

Military adventuresomeness is far from the ideal or most practiced option. Ferdinand DeSoto in his book, "The Third Path", describes the gradual success of American economic advisors and Brazilian capital assistance in Chile, Peru, Uruguay and Argentina.

What, then, should be the role American policy is to take? I would advance the idea of encouraging, wherever possible, the evolution of capitalist democracies. The system, sharing to a greater or lesser extent by all First World nations may not be perfect, but the ascendance of such a system is irrevocably tied to the fact that capitalist democracies do not go to war with each other.

On the contrary, the nations of Europe through Euro '92 and the nations of North America through the North American Free Trade Agreement are progressing toward an economically interdependent global village in which violent conflict is impossible. This is in direct contrast to what internationalists like Marx predicted, and to what our own campus communists would like us to believe. Our system results in the most stable, ordered and productive society. How many Pan-Africanists, who sing the glories of Third World collectives, would care to move to one? (I'm sure we could discover funds for a few one-way tickets.)

Of course, it may be necessary to work with regimes falling far outside our ideal society, monarchies like Saudi Arabia during the Gulf War; however, through dealing with First World nations, such societies cannot fail to be influenced by their contact. Happy Meals and Coke killed the Soviet Bear, not Pershing II cruise missiles.

Alexis de Tocqueville wrote that British democratic traditions were of causal importance in the development of the American democracy. We cannot assume that other nations, convulsed by social strife, will steer the course that was so difficult in the calm seas of 1789. American assistance should not be a reportage of Kipling's "white man's burden," but the providing of a breathing space of stability so vital to an emerging democracy. The only other option is a retreat into isolationism. It was ineffective 70 years ago, and it is impossible today. This is the option permitting the rise of Hitler and Mussolini, and today gives us simulcast views of riots in Serbia and Somalia. An American exeunt is a yielding of the stage to ethnic violence and thermonuclear terrorism.

Think you recycle? Check again

I use the PVTA or ride my bike whenever possible. I use energy conserving light bulbs. I bring my grocery bags back to the store when I shop. Little things like these have always made me feel I am doing my part to help lessen my impact on the environment. Recently, I had an experience that burst my helpful citizen bubble. Recycling is the topic. Falling short in my efforts and being tricked by a fancy marketing campaign is the story.

I heard the line a thousand times: "Solid waste crisis: reduce, reuse, recycle!" Recycling was easy; I collected my paper and then dropped them into my residence hall's recycling barrels.

One night, while talking to my neighbor, the environmental guru, I learned the shortcomings of this level of involvement in recycling. Just collecting recyclables and putting them in the barrels isn't enough. I have to buy, use and demand recycled material in the products I buy. Recycling as a solution to the solid waste crisis is hindered by the lack of consumer use of recycled products. If there's no demand for recycled products, there will be no demand for the materials that make recycled products.

With my new knowledge on how to recycle, I went to the University Store to buy my notebooks for the semester. I bought a couple of recycled notebooks and headed back to my environmental guru to show her my effort to "close the loop."

I was unhappy with her next lesson. I had bought a recycled notebook that not only had zero percent post-consumer paper, but was also bleached. The notebook was made of manufacturing waste cuttings, commonly called pre-consumer waste. This pre-consumer waste is made into new paper by the factories on the basis of cost-effectiveness. Since my notebook didn't have any post-consumer waste (post me and you), I had done nothing to help "close the loop" or create demand for the paper I had recycle.

My lack of success in trying to shop as a recycler was compounded by the news that the paper I had bought was bleached. To get notebook paper white, as opposed to the grey color of newsprint, it is often bleached with chlorine gas. The residual from this process is an organochlorine classified as a dioxin. Dioxin is the generic term for a group of carcinogens extremely toxic to humans and animals. It is also resistant to biological breakdown.

I returned my pseudo-recycled, toxic waste producing notebook to the store. Fearing a long search for unbleached, post-consumer paper, I strolled through the Campus Center Concourse. I saw a banner hanging in front of a vending table: "Close the Loop." The Housing Services Recycling Program had a table with inexpensive school supplies made from post-consumer content as well as unbleached paper. I loaded up on notebooks, a pen made from recycled foam cups from a New York deli, and even a note board made from recycled tires.

The Housing Recycling people were playing a video about recycling. In the video, Dr. John summed up my lesson: "Buy stuff that's recycled, recycle the stuff that you buy."

"It really scares me a lot — I thought they'd never go through with it. I thought they might understand or think of something to help me out," Svetlana said.

Responding to Svetlana's memo, Head of Circulation Services Betty Brace informed her in a memo dated Sept. 17 that failure to appear for the newly scheduled work assignment "would be considered insubordination, and disciplinary action may be taken."

Svetlana said she is not eligible for unemployment benefits now. She will only receive one lump sum of money for retirement, instead of the retirement package she would receive if she continued to work. She added that she cant't receive social security.

"It's such an unreasonable decision to make, I don't know what to think," Svetlana said.

She was told that she needed a statement, mentioning her inablity to work the evening shift, from her physician. Her doctor acknowledged her stress, but couldn't write her a note, according to Svetlana.

Gordon Fretwell, Associate Director of Public Service at the Library said he could not comment on a personnel issue, but had mentioned Svetlana has not been "terminated." Brace also declined to comment.

For the past 18 years, Svetlana has been a library assistant on the third floor of the Library. In the Reserve department, she processed materials professors gave her for students purposes.

Svetlana said this is the third reassignment she has received. About twelve years ago, Svetlana, who speaks Russian and German, felt discriminated against because she was the only worker in the information processing department, who had not received a promotion.

Before she finished grieving the case, she was transferred to the Collections department, where she worked for 10 years.

Rehearsals begin for Symphony

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

The Pioneer Valley Wind Symphony, a new musical ensemble conducted by Gregory Mayer of the University of Massachusetts Music Department, starts now!

The Symphony was created to provide performance opportunities for Five-College students and local community members. Membership is open to any wind or percussion instrumentalist who demonstrates musical proficiency.

"Your experience with this group will provide the opportunity to play for guest conductors and participate in public concerts," says Mayer. "One of our first performances will be a holiday concert during the month of December."

Interested individuals should plan to attend the first rehearsal tonight at 7 p.m. in room 36 of the Fine Arts Center, where the rehearsals will continue to be held every Tuesday from 7 to 9 p.m.

"This situation is perfect for musicians who have a limited amount of time to devote to a busy rehearsal schedule or for those who are searching for additional playing opportunities," says Mayer.

Mayer stresses that his auditions are "painless. A lot of people get scared of that word: audition. I do too. Basically, I have them so I can get a feel as to how I should place people."

Fiddler raises the roof at Fine Arts Ctr

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

It was twenty-eight years ago today that Fiddler on the Roof premiered on Broadway in what many critics have come to regard as a strictly formative stage.

That night's leading man was Zero Mostel, an improvisatory comedian and self-professed pain in the ass who enjoyed changing lines to throw off his co-stars and tossing props into the orchestra pit. The director, dance genius Jerome Robbins, is said to have spent so much time devising the show's sensational choreography that he all but forgot plot and character.

Though it may be trite to accuse a show of "improving with age," it is clear that the Fiddler which set audiences cheering Sunday night was far removed from its music-hall origins.

Director Sammy Dallas Bayes (who was also at the helm of the recent Tony-winning Broadway revival) has given new breath and new depth to the musical by treating it as true drama and excising some of the more ridiculous comedy routines. The result is a moving image of life amongst the Jewish peasantry in Tsarist Russia.

John Preece stars as Tevye, the downtrodden dairyman of Sholem Alecheim's stories, who must cope with the dissolution of his family and tumultuous social change which threatens to destroy his way of life. If Preece lacks some of the vitality of his predecessor (Chaim Topol; who played Tevye on Broadway, on the screen and on the first string of this tour), he nevertheless serves as a steady anchor for the show. Tevye's quiet pride, as he is heaped with indignities, is powerfuly evoked and Preece's performance of the show's greatest song, "Chava," is wonderful.

The supporting cast is functional but unexceptional with the best performances coming from unlikely places. Pat Powers is delightfully flighty as the village matchmaker and Craig Benham is surprisingly powerful in his tiny role as a local constable who is trapped between his friendship with Tevye and his orders to execute a bloody pogrom.

But Fiddler is not a show about stars. Joseph Stein's magnificent book could elicit tears from the coldest of hearts, in the worst of productions and director Bayes pulls all the right strings. He is particularly adept at making images which speak of life and emotion. The scene when a pained Tevye must silently ignore his daughter (who abandoned family and faith to marry a Russian) is thoughtful and understated, with all the awkwardness of reality. Equally exceptional is Bayes' treatment of the Act One finale, in which members of a disrupted wedding reception listen in silent horror to the sounds of a distant pogrom.

This Fiddler may seem darker and more hopeless that past productions — but it is also more memorable and more affecting.

The score by Jerry Bock and Sheldon Harnick is a showcase of musical gems, including the endlessly wonderful "Chava" and the standars "Far from the Home I Love," "Sunrise Sunset" as well as the whimsical "If I Were a Rich Man."

Some of the richness of this score is lost in simplified arrangements and a woefully abbreviated orchestra (really a small band), yet the singers — particularly Preece and his second daughter, Natalie Collins — are strong-voiced enough to make you forget.

The design may be strictly truck-and-bus and the cast may be largely second-stringers but this Fiddler has a style and appeal which makes every moment a joy.

Black Sheep set themselves apart from the hip hop flock

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Even its name affirms that this duo is not the same as the rest of the rap pack. Black Sheep, Dres and Mista Lawnge (pronounced Long), strive towards setting themselves apart from the rest.

"We felt differnt than a lot of the stuff on the market. We wanted to go 'bout things in a different manner. Wolf in Sheep's Clothing is a very conceptual album and a forum for discussion," says Dres.

Along with other rap notables, De La Soul, A Tribe Called Quest and The Jungle Brothers, Black Sheep is part of the Native Tongues hip hop family. "The Choice is Yours" is their most well-known cut from their debut album Wolf in Sheep's Clothing, but recently, "Strobelite Honey" has been getting some serious airplay.

"Honey" in particular shows off Sheep's more humorous side, being at clubs with girls that look like pearls from afar but clams up close. This attitude contrasts sharply with what the duo is like offstage.

"We're very much different than we are on record. We're very soft spoken and very withdrawn," explains Dres.

Dres even cites Stevie Wonder as his biggest influence, "I think all of his stuff is great, especially the stuff from the 60s and 70s."

Black Sheep were nominated for a Music Television Award this month. In addition to this accomplishment Black Sheep have shot an afterschool special and worked with Vanessa Williams on her new album.

"Black Sheep will perform tonight at 7 p.m. at Pearl Street in Northampton. Tickets are available on campus at Tickets Unlimited in the Student Union Building for $10 and $12 at the show.

Workshop offers sex appeal

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

When I think of all of the factors which contribute to "the college experience," it blows my mind how much we do and need to learn outside of the classroom. One significant aspect of our newly attained freedom once we don the label, "college student" is our sexuality.

College provides us with the freedom to translate our sexual knowledge into tangible practice. It also gives us a chance to realize that maybe we don't know quite as much as we think we do about sex.

If you find yourself in that last category, you should definitly be aware that the students enrolled in Public Health 213/Peer Health Education are here to help you. Class members are currently undergoing peer sexuality education training, which will enable them to conduct workshops in various locations throughout the campus next semester.

The course consists of a dozen or so students who have all partaken in workshops from previous years. The peer educators learn about a multitude of sex-related topics and are trained to present this information to students. Peer educators are taught skills which will enable them to answer questions and direct students who may have more specific needs. Workshops will be held in residence halls, classes, fraternities/sororities, and any place else upon request next semester.

Myra Edlestein, Senior Health Educator and the course instructor praises the work of the class members.

"These students provide a link between students on campus and the health service available. The second part of the role of the health educators is that they are change agents on campus. They can educate and hopefully change attitudes about social issues." asserts Edlestein.

The peer health educators enrolled in the course hope to present such important issues as AIDS, birth control, monogamy, and the vital role of communication in a sexual relationship. The students discuss the most effective ways of presenting the material, work on film segments, demonstrations and discussions. Peer educators are also unique in the respect that they, too are students and can empathize with and relate well to those who attend the workshops.

Sam Mckinley, a teaching assistant of the course acknowledges that students are tired of dealing with health professionals. She claims that the generational lines along which information concerning sex is presented often leaves a gap between what educators feel is important and what students need to know. Mckinley feels that the peer educators are more accessible to students and better able to understand where they are coming from.

Kathryn Day, who is also a teaching assistant of the course, agrees the program provides both students and peer educators the opportunity to learn from each other in an open, supportive atmosphere.

Peer educators agree that realistic goals must be kept in sight in terms of influencing peoples' behavior. A major frustration for health educators is that there are rarely immediate results of their work. Helping people adopt positive behaviors often takes months or even years.

Equally frustrating is the fact that some people simply

do not want information, or are self-destructive and choose not to practice positive behaviors. The peer educators understand the difficulty in determining and knowing how to use correct information concerning sex. Their job is to make that information and advice available so that we may all lead more healthy lives, which, according to Mckinley, we all have a responsibility to do.

"Everyone is sexual, whether they are having sex or not." she stated.

Because of this, and in light of the many health risks involved in sexual activity, Edlestein feels that students need three tools in order to ensure safer, more healthy lives. Knowledge, attitude, and practice (K.A.P.) are equally important concerning sex. Because knowing information does not always mean adopting a good attitude about it, and because adopting a good attitude does not ensure having the skills to practice it, Edlestein and the peer educators incorporate all three components into the workshops.

"This class has a total, practical application." states Edlestein. All majors are encouraged to enroll in this year-long, 6 credit course.

If you would like more information about the Peer Health Education course, or about organizing a workshop, call the Health Education office, 549-2671 ext. 181.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Display a positive attitude and an important relationship will turn around. A preoccupation with your health fades as you begin to feel better. Get out and socialize more.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Watch your step when dealing with hard-to-please authority figures. Projecting an aura of confidence will get you a front-row seat at an important meeting.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Change is inevitable. Starwise, there is no reason for you to fear the future. Although the love boat sails under cloudy skies at times, it will not sink. Have faith.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): It is time to rethink your priorities and review the direction your life is taking. Let past mistakes guide, not discourage, you. Newfound resources help you get a pet project launched.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You have more energy than in recent days. Tackle a complicated project you have been postponing. Protect a romantic dinner from interruptions or uninvited guests.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Avoid dwelling on a recent disjointment. Concentrate on winning - the odds are in your favor! Your personal appeal is at an all-time high. Plan a romantic interlude.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Financial worries can overshadow all other concerns. Refuse to fret about matters beyond your control. A chance encounter could lead to a profitable business venture!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Examine a relationship that is going nowhere. Thinking things through ensures that you will not jump to conclusions or rush off in the wrong direction.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Your new self-esteem enhances every aspect of your life. Review your goals before making any sudden moves. Family members should be consulted on domestic issues.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Better results will be obtained once you learn to go with the flow. A loophole will help you get out of a contract if you so desire. Listen to your conscience.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Your partner may be more vocal than usual today. Play the waiting game in both business and romance. If a legal matter reaches a stalemate, the delay could work in your favor.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A secret that is revealed now makes you whistle with surprise! Your luck changes for the better. Before buying a car or expensive jewelry, put some money away

Carrill is the yoda of the hoopworld, stressing tough D and a motion offense to the max.

If Carrill could get some real players to execute his backdoor cuts, he would be an annual Final Four participant. Minuteman fans, I didn't forget John Calipari, he's a coach on the rise along with Ohio State's Randy Ayers and Cincinnati's Bob Huggins.

In pro football, Joe Gibbs is reknowned for his overall coaching abilities. That, plus his track record make him my choice over the fastly rising Jimmy Johnson and the established Mary Levy.

Looking at college football, it's tough to pick the best coach because there is so much to choose from. Despite their loss to Tennessee Saturday, I'll have to go with Steve Spurrier of Florida.

Spurrier is an offensive genius who has brought Florida back to the top tier of college football. Two people weren't picked because of particular things I hate about them.

Lou Holtz of Notre Dame coached with a yellow streak against Michigan and his post game tirade on John Dockery was so pathetic. Bill McCartney of Colorado was also considered, but his insistence in overseeing the outside world of his players exempted him. Bill, there's no need to instill your incredibly stern beliefs about life into your players, lighten up.

In boxing, Eddie Futch is the easy winner. Futch, who is about 529 years old, is like old man river, he keeps rollin' along. Futch is a main reason why Riddick Bowe will defeat Evander Holyfield on November 13th.

Now to tennis, a much maligned sport, Jose Higuera is the best tennis coach in the world. He led Michael Chang to the French title in 1989 before Chang foolishly dumped him for his painfully ugly brother Carl Chang.

Higuera now coaches Jim Courier, who has won three Grand Slam championships. Tony Pickard, coach of world #1 Stefan Edberg, is the #2 coach in the world.

Now to badmitton, naw I'm kidding, my life isn't that sad . . . yet. It's time to debut two new features, which will become weekly:

Dunce of the Week: This award has got to go out to Cincy manager Lou Pinellia. For Pinellia to think he could actually wrestle with Rob Dibble is crazy. Lou, you dunce, Dibble would and will tear you apart on any occasion, so just climb back into your cage.

Obscure Fact of the Week: Don Slaught is hitting .349 in 264 at bats.

The weekend's last game was a 10-7 win over Princeton in a game that left Yarworth with a sour taste for the Ivy League school. In the waning seconds of a game UMass had clearly in hand, the Tigers' Chad Elliot punched Mariani in the face. The punch was not seen by the referee and Mariani did not retaliate.

"I think the Princeton players are a bunch of punks," Yarworth said. "They can't deal with losing and they don't win well either."

The game before the punch was a close one as Princeton carried a 3-2 lead into the locker room at halftime. It could have been worse had Mujica not saved a penalty shot in the second quarter.

Engin tossed in all three of his goals and Harlan added another in the decisive forth quarter. Gonzalez and Reed each tallied twice, and Oliete and Alters once. Mujica finished with nine saves.

GAME NOTES: Yarworth — "I talk a lot about the starters and the scorers, but it's guys like Lau, Schragger, Deluca, Harlan, McAuliffe, and others that bust their asses in practice but don't always get the big playing time. That's what makes this team great. It's hard to swallow your desire to play and still come to practice and kill yourself, but that's what these guys are doing."

Women kick Rutgers for fifth in a row

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team continued to roll on as it defeated Rutgers 1-0 Saturday to advance its record to 5-0 on the season.

Massachusetts, ranked No. 9 in the nation, played one of its strongest games of the season to achieve its first road win of the year.

Forward Kim Eynard scored the game's only goal in the 29th minute. UMass defenseman Lisa Mickelson gained possession of the ball on the left flank, near midfield. Using her left foot she crossed the ball to Holly Hellmuth who was breaking down the right wing.

From 40 yards out, Hellmuth chipped the ball into the goal mouth where Eynard outleapt a Rutgers defender and headed the ball over Rutgers goalkeeper Saskia Webber and into the net.

"It was a wonderful goal," Massachusets coach Jim Rudy said. "An unbelievable looking play. Eynard rose majestically above the Rutgers defender, just straight up out-jumped her. It was a great leap, but the passing was also beautiful."

For Eynard, it was her third tally of the season and her third game winner.

"Kim is playing like the mature player we always thought she'd be," Rudy said. "She has risen her game to a new level this season."

Briana Scurry made 12 saves to make Eynards goal hold up, as she improved her record to 3-0 on the year. It was Scurry's second shutout and lowered her goals against average to 0.66 on the season.

"Scurry was terrific," Rudy said. "She had to make some big saves in the second half but she made them look routine. She is so quick in the box that she gets to balls other goalies could not."

Scurry's biggest test came off of a Rutgers corner with ten minutes remaining in the game. The Knights' leading scorer Christa Aluoto headed the serve towards the back corner which forced Scurry to dive to her lower left to knock it away.

"It was a very athletic play," Rudy said. "She had to fully extend herself in order to touch it out."

From that point on Massachusetts was able to run out the clock to remain undefeated on the year.

"We played a dynamic game today," Rudy said. "We put together our passing and we were able to dominate. Our first half was our quickest and best half of the year. The attack stayed in front and we were running very well. I was quite pleased with our focus."

Massachusetts looks to extend the winning streak to six as it hosts Harvard at 3:00 p.m. on Wednesday.

Women X-C defeat BC

By JASON NASH
Collegian Correspondent

Gigantic. Herculean. Huge. These, along with others, are perfect adjectives to sum up the University of Massachusetts women's cross country team's victory over Boston College on Saturday in Amherst, by a score of 24 to 31. Massachusetts increased its record to 2-0, with what may turn out to be UMass' biggest win of the year.

"This was a really big win," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said. "This is one of the toughest three-mile courses in New England. We definitely had the home meet advantage. B.C. led until they hit the hills."

Junior Kelly Liljeblad crushed her competitors, setting her personal best on the home course and beating B.C.'s best runner by 50 seconds.

Twin sister Kim Liljeblad finished second with a gutsy finish with just a 1/2 mile left in the race.

Rounding off UMass' top five were tri-captains Becky Johnson (fourth), Maureen Meldrim (seventh) and Tricia Mathewson (tenth).

How big was this win? Well, consider that Boston College was 17th in the country last year and were one of the two teams that are selected from New England to the national championships. Throw in the fact that UMass hasn't beaten B.C. for six years and you've got the formula for what LaFreniere calls a perfect day.

Winner Kelly Liljeblad said, "We were really psyched going in, everyone was really pulling for each other and keeping a great attitude."

Though winner Kelly Liljeblad was in command the whole race, Lafreniere could not emphasize enough about the second place finish of twin sister Kim.

"She looked fantastic," said LaFreniere. "She really poured it on in the end and just seemed to get stronger and stronger as the race went on."

Kim Liljeblad said, "I new it was going to be a close race for second place. I passed [B.C. runner Linda Spence] coming downhill with about a half of a mile left. I felt much better this week physically and mainly mentally."

UMass looks ahead to their next meet on Saturday in Vermont in a tri-meet will Vermont and Boston University.

Water polo wins three

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts water polo team brought two ideas of their performance in this young season back with them from this past weekend's first round of the Eastern Championship at Princeton University.

The first is that last week's 4-0 performance at the Army Invitational was no fluke. The second is that if an NCAA Tournament berth is to be achieved, the big games have to be played as such.

The 15th-ranked Minutemen (7-1) went 3-1 at Princeton, winning big in the games they were expected to win, and losing the weekend's premiere match-up against the nation's No. 12 team, Slippery Rock (PA).

"We grew up a lot this weekend," said UMass coach Russ Yarworth. "We also realized that we haven't played our best polo yet. Slippery Rock intimidated us, so we have work to do."

'The Rock', the No.1 team in the East and first truly powerful competition UMass has faced this season, was the weekend's third opponent. After going down 4-0 after the first period, UMass crept back to a 7-4 deficit at the half. The third period was another scoreless one for the Minutemen, as they eventually ended up on the short end of a 13-6 decision.

"The Rock's defense dropped off our outside players, so we couldn't pass the ball into 'T' [Tsan Engin]," Yarworth said. "We had to pass the ball around the outside, taking the shots they wanted us to take. We were tentative to drive, and that is something we have to be able to do if we are to be successful."

Saturday morning the Minutemen took care of unranked Washington & Lee, bursting out of the gate for an 8-3 halftime lead before winning 15-7.

Jeremy Alters, Javier Gonzalez, Luke Harlan, Engin and Rich Schragger all scored two goals. Pat Lau, Denny Kinne, Adolpho Oliete, Scott Reed and Fransisco Mariani all added one apice. Todd Hourihan recorded five saves in goal.

The second game was a 22-6 waxing of Queens University as Schragger poured in four goals. Kinne and Dan McAuliffe had three goals each, and Scott Deluca, Alters, Reed and Mariani each had two. Four other players added one each.

Alex Mujica and Hourihan split time in goal, recording four saves each.

Gonzalez and Harlan scored twice each, and Reed and Schragger added one each. Mujica stopped four shots and Hourihan recorded five saves.

Field hockey faces Stanford

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team is hoping lightning strikes twice at 1:00 p.m. today at Northeastern's Parsons Field.

Head coach Pam Hixon and her squad are hoping that they can do the same thing to Stanford today as they did to No. 5 North Carolina last Saturday: that is, pull off a "road" win. The Minutewomen hope to follow the pattern of their 1-0 shocker over the Tar Heels.

CHRISTOPHER EVANS / COLLEGIAN
The UMass field hockey team goes for its sixth win in a row today at 1 p.m. in Boston against Stanford. The game is being played at Northeastern's Parsons Field.

The field hockey team has traditionally used Northeastern's field as a surrogate home field, and this is the second game they have played there this year. The proximity of the field from Boston's Logan Airport makes it easier for teams from the South and West to fly in and play UMass there instead of in Amherst.

"Boston has been our home away from home, at least this year," Hixon said. "I think it's a good opportunity for us, because we're on a stretch now that we're gonna be on turf for an extended period of time."

The Cardinal is somewhat of an enigma for UMass, who know virtually nothing about the Stanford squad. UMass' game plan is to concentrate on what has been successful for them: a strong defensive front and crisp passing.

"I don't know a thing about Stanford," said Hixon. "We haven't played them in years, so we're going in against them sight unseen."

The weekly NCAA field hockey poll coincides with the UMass-Stanford game, so there is a good chance the Minutewomen will take the field not as the eighth best team in the country, but possibly as one of the top five.

Massachusetts has remained undefeated thus far, despite tough games on the road against No. 7 Providence and North Carolina. The team draws comparisons with last year's squad, which started the season 8-0.

"We're much stronger at this point than we were last year," said Hixon. "We have more depth, we're playing more as a team."

UMass goalie Philippa Scott can attest to that. Scott, a junior, notched three shutouts over the past week, and has still only allowed one goal this year. The strong UMass defense has controlled opposing offenses, and teams have gotten few good opportunities against Scott, who has a 0.22 goals-against average.

Crofts praises the best coaches

It's time for someone to look at the people behind the athletes; the coaches, trainers, or managers who make the athletes the successes that they are. I think I'll judge the best in each sport, or make that each sport I care about.

In baseball, there are three candidates, Tony LaRussa, Jim Leyland, and Tom Kelly. I'm going to have to side with LaRussa, what he's done with the A's is incredible.

Jeff
CROFTS

LaRussa has had to put up with team bickering, a line-up (save Mark McGwire) that only the Red Sox can rival for patheticness, and starting pitching that's been wearing down for a couple of years.

Yet, LaRussa still has the A's in first place, and for that he gets the nod over the similar Leyland and the crafty Kelley.

In pro basketball, Pat Riley of the Knicks gets the nod. Riley has turned the Knicks around and has made them into an incredibly tough, hard-nosed team. He won with the Lakers and now he's winning with the Knicks.

Don Nelson of the Warriors is probably the best stategist in the NBA. What Nellie did to the Spurs in the playoffs a couple of years ago was probably the most impressive coaching display in the last ten years. Riley however, gets the overall nod for his sustained success.

As for college basketball, you can have Mike Krzyzshewski, Robert Montgomery Knight, and Dean Smith. I'll take Princeton's Petey Carrill.

Kissinger denies allegations he had knowledge of POWs

By WILLIAM W. WELCH
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Henry Kissinger on Tuesday denounced as "a flat-out lie" the allegation that he and others knew U.S. servicemen were left behind when the war in Southeast Asia ended two decades ago.

Two people who made such suggestions Monday were Kissinger's colleagues from the Nixon administration — defense secretaries James R. Schlesinger and Melvin Laird.

But the former secretary of state and national security adviser acknowledged that even as he negotiated peace with the North Vietnamese, he recognized they had not provided an adequate accounting for missing Americans.

And in a sometimes hostile exchange with members of a Senate committee, Kissinger didn't rule out the possibility that some Americans survived after U.S. soldiers were withdrawn from the jungles of Southeast Asia in 1973.

"I think it's improbable any are alive today," Kissinger said. "I have always kept open the possibility in my mind there were some in Laos."

Kissinger's intensely defensive, sometimes combative testimony came under oath before an extraordinary hearing by the Senate Select Committee on POW-MIA Affairs.

The bipartisan panel is trying to answer lingering questions about the fate of missing soldiers and airmen two decades after the conclusion of the Vietnam War, which divided the nation.

Kissinger testified a day after other former Nixon officials, including Schlesinger and Laird said they believed some American prisoners were still in Vietnam or Laos after the withdrawal of U.S. troops and the 1973 release of more than 591 prisoners of war. The former defense secretaries cited reliable reports of more POWs, particularly in Laos, than were released.

Kissinger said neither man ever expressed those views at the time.

"If we had known, if we had heard this, we would have acted on it," Kissinger said.

He bitterly disputed suggestions "that when President Nixon announced that all prisoners were on the way home, he or his aides knew that many were left behind."

"The allegation is a flat-out lie," Kissinger said, blaming the assertions on "leads that could only have come from this inquiry."

Kissinger acknowledged receiving "some reports alleging that live Americans were still in Indochina," and said they "were taken seriously" by U.S. officials.

"But no confirmed report of living American prisoners ever crossed my desk, although I am not saying they did not exist," he said.

The Senate committee room was crowded with spectators, some Vietnam veterans wearing camouflage jackets and war decorations. Some were relatives of men still unaccounted for, such as Collene Shine of Arlington, Va., whose father, Air Force Lt. Col. Anthony Shine, was downed Dec. 2, 1972 on the Lao-North Vietnam border.

"The families have been lied to," she said. "We have been victims of lies and a lack of effort. I'd like the priority to be focused on returning Americans alive."

The session, conducted under the glare of television lights, at times recalled the bitter, emotional divisions spawned by the Vietnam war.

Kissinger insisted that the administration has pressed the North Vietnamese strongly for release of all prisoners and an accounting of the missing, including those in neighboring Laos. But he contended the administration's efforts were undercut by actions in Congress to force an end to U.S. military operations, including bombing of the North.

"I had no means of pressure left," Kissinger said, referring to his negotiations in Paris with the North Vietnamese. "all I could do is bluff my way through this."

Multiculturalism taken seriously on UM campus

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Correspondent

Editor's note: This is the first in a series examining multiculturalism from several different perspectives. The series will include interviews with various faculty members and students at the University of Massachusetts.

The multicultural movement is gaining momentum on college campuses across the nation and many students are still unclear on the significance of this widely-heralded and often maligned movement.

Dr. Benjamin Rodriguez, director of the Bilingual Collegiate Program, believes the minority population on campus contributes to cultural diversity.

"We must be more convincing to the faculty at large that cultural diversity is here to enrich the campus, and that the presence of minority students at UMass should be viewed as positive to the University," he said.

Multicultural awareness at UMass has sparked many students into taking the initiative to seek and exchange cultural ideas.

"The administration has made great gains to foster cultural awareness and diversity, and continues to be committed," Rodriguez said.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien has taken the vision even further by recently forming a multicultural advisory board consisting of key faculty members to further analyze and promote cultural awareness and sensitivity on campus.

In fact, recent studies indicate that there still is a need to address the needs of our ever growing diverse student body.

Amit Ghosh, a student from India, believes there is a growing concern among many international students concerning the lack of educational and cultural awareness.

"There is very little awareness among students here at UMass," Ghosh said. "Many students do not know where our country is located."

Ghosh also said that "many students focus more on their majors and do not take the time to ask or make serious inquiry into the world about them."

Afro-American Studies Professor John Bracey believes that students can benefit by engaging cross-culturally with one another and that much has been accomplished by pursuing, interacting and acknowledging differences.

The Afro-Centric consciousness is a reality on this campus today due, in part, to a similar process, Bracey said. "Being culturally aware will enable students to widen their scope of knowledge, and better interact with the world around them," said Bracey. "The administration's response by including cultural diversity courses is a step in the right direction."

Benjamin Rodriguez said recent campus cultural events, such as the annual International Fair, the Indian Pow Wow and the Malcolm X picnic, are prime examples of encouraging interaction among various cultures.

"The University of Massachusetts continues to strive to bridge the gap between cultures and promote cultural sensitivity," Rodriguez said. "These and other events help educate and strengthen cultural ties between faculty and students."

Sharon Panoff, a senior said, "It is necessary to be culturally aware — one of

"A dam which will be a credit to the college is soon to materialize," reported the Sept. 21, 1892 issue of "Aggie Life," then the Massachusetts Agricultural College student newspaper.

Over a century and a few changes later, the dam and subsequent Campus Pond is one of the University's most widely-known and visual landmarks.

From Sept. 14 to Jan. 15, the Archives Department, located on the 25th floor of the Tower Library, plan to commemorate the Campus Pond's 100th Anniversary with an extensive exhibit.

The display, which Archives Assistant Mike Milewski said has taken him over two years to complete, includes vintage photographs of the pond, newspaper articles dating back to the early 1900s and an extensive compilation of documents tracing the pond's construction history.

The Archives Department believes this exhibit is an important part of the effort to attract the public's attention to the history of the campus.

As the documents show, the pond

UM enrollment situation seen as promising

By MICHAEL R. LINSKEY
Collegian Staff

Although enrollment in the University of Massachusetts has reached its lowest point in 20 years, three campus officials said the downward trend may soon be reversed, due to the unexpected size of the incoming freshman class.

Improved financial aid packages, acceptance of a larger percentage of the applicant pool, and lower incidence of what was refered to as the "summer melt" has given the University its largest freshman class since 1989, according to Timm R. Rinehart, director of Undergraduate Admissions, Registrar Nancy Fitzpatrick, and Marilyn H. Blaustein, director of Institutional Research and Planning.

"The summer melt refers to all the students you lose between May 1 — the deadline for deposits — and Sept. 1, when students come back to school," Rhinehart said. "It's the difference between the number of students who put down deposits in May and those who actually enroll in September."

Rhinehart put the total number of freshman at 3,975, a number representing "more students by far than we thought we'd get." He attributed the unexpected increase partly to lower rate of summer melt than normal, and partly to incentives extended to freshman by the University.

"We lose 10 to 15 percent every year to summer melt; that's standard across the years and across universities in general," he said. "But this year, it was closer to 5 percent. We also offered better financial aid packages, and many parents felt they wanted to send their children here instead of other places."

Fitzpatrick listed statistics showing that total undergraduate enrollment, which has been in a state of marked decline in the past four years, dipped only slightly for this fall — something she attributes to the unexpected size of the class of 1996.

"The decline has been due to the lower numbers of freshman we've been attracting, and the lower number of students we've retained," she said. "But this year, efforts were made to improve the recruitment of students and the financial aid packages for those we accept for enrollment."

"Based on projections, [the total number of under-

LETTERS HOME - UMass students wait in line to send home for more money.

UHS looking for the shot-less

2,000 face withdrawl for lack of immunization shots

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

When freshman biochemistry major Nicole Turceon arrived at UMass, she received a letter from University Health Services stating that she did not have the proper immunizations.

"They are requiring me to have another measles shot. I had the measles shot five days before my first birthday," Turceon said. "My doctor said I should be cleared."

Yet Turceon is not alone, because this fall there are almost 2,000 students who risk being academically dropped from the University if they do not hand in their completed medical forms in time.

"We do not want to withdraw students, but we are required by state law," said Judith Whitcomb, Health Service's system manager. "We are trying very hard. We even gave the names of doctors in town, if students do not want to go to Health Services."

At this time Health Services are administrating a $25 late fee to those who have not sent their forms. If students still have not sent in their forms after pre-registration, then they will be withdrawn from school. They will lose their housing, and all their spring semester classes.

According to Massachusetts state law, any full-time student must be fully immunized for measles, mumps, rubella (German measles), tetanus and diphtheria, before they step on campus. This law requires students to give Health Services an up-to-date immunization record, showing that students have received tetanus, and diphtheria shots within 10 years. Students should also have been immunized twice for measles after their first birthday.

"If students are from Massachusetts, they should have an up-to-date health record from their high school. It is state law," Whitcomb said. "They can mail or fax us a copy. Students can come down to Health Services this Friday to receive immunizations for a fee."

Health Services sent out a health form this summer, asking for students to mail in their immunization records. When the University did not receive the forms or they were inadequately filled out, Health Services sent another letter, asking the students to send in their information.

Student gov't grabs 500 in registration drive

A bullhorn graced the presence of the Student Union steps once again.

"We can register you to vote in any city or town. Out of state students can register too," shouted Matt Pavesi, the chairman of public policy from Student Government Association.

About 500 students have registered so far in the three-day voter registration drive, which began yesterday. The drive is sponsored by Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group and SGA.

"We can definitely make a difference in local races," said Pavesi. "We have the numbers to make a difference in the congressional and state representative race."

MassPIRG and SGA are aiming to register at least 2,000 students. Not more than 500 students were registered last year.

"I think we can definitely make our goal," said Jennifer Wood, SGA president. "We're well along our way."

Wood attributes such a good turnout to the presidential election this year.

"Everywhere you turn, people are talking about voting in the presidential race," said Wood. "This is everybody's first time to vote in the presidential race."

She said half the battle is over, convincing people that they need to register.

"This year we just had to publicize the event," she said. "We're very happy with it."

Pavesi said the drive is turning into

Exploring Jewish humor

Author says most humor optimistic

By MIMI FELLNER
Collegian Correspondent

One of the most prominent contemporary Jewish writers to hit the nation, visited the University of Massachusetts on Monday night for an event sponsored by the Hillel House.

Rabbi Joseph Telushkin, author of Jewish Literacy as well as Why the Jews? The Reasons for Antisemitism, explained his comedic writing to an audience of about 250 people.

He discussed the "100 best Jewish jokes and what they say about the Jews."

"There is still one underlying theme that seems to link all Jewish humor and that is optimism," Telushkin said.

The speaker was introduced first by Rabbi Saul Perlmutter of Hillel House as well as Josh Slomich president of Hillel, who gave a brief background of the author.

Telushkin, who was ordained at Yeshivah University in New York, spoke clearly and expressively about ethnic humor, especially Jewish humor, in the U.S. in the last two decades. "It's not that I use my hands when I speak — it's just that this fly here is driving me crazy," he said, providing an example.

A leading activist in the cause of Soviet Jewry, Telushkin was the first foreign Jew to meet with Jewish activists in Siberia in 1973.

He mentioned the stereotypical jokes of Polish, Irish, Italian and other ethnic groups outside, as well as within, their own groups. He humorously related the extent of Jewish wit ranging from mother-in-law jokes to Yiddish jokes to the high aspirations of Jewish parents.

Telushkin described Jewish humor as being introspective or self-mocking of the Western civilization is said to have developed a stereotypical image of non-western cultures through media. But what image do non-western people have of western civilization?

A group of five scholars from the University of Massachusetts and Amherst College just received a two-year $235,000 grant from the Getty Grant Program which will enable them to conduct massive research on the answer to this question.

"I was elated about receiving the grant because it provides an opportunity for professors of the Five College area to discuss their ideas on artistic and visual representation of different cultures," said Jacqueline Urla, an anthropology professor at UMass.

Frank Couvares, a history and American studies professor at Amherst College, said the study would use visual objects such as artifacts, films, paintings and photographs.

He said the research was important because it will frame the world in many plural ways and through many minorities' eyes. "Western people will have a distorted sense of the world if they don't learn how non-western people see the world."

was created by damming up a stream that ran between the Botanic Museum and North Dormitory, now Morrill Science Center. The action was initiated and supervised by William Wheeler, a graduate of the first class of 1871.

Milewski said initially the pond was created out of a need for large quantities of ice that could be cut away and used to preserve fresh fruit and dairy products.

But as the exhibit illustrates, the pond soon became the central point around which many student activities were held.

In 1909, the pond was the sight of the first hockey game. From there, this artificially constructed body of water went on to becoming an ice-skating rink while its banks played host to the Winter Carnival in the late 1920s.

Until 1958, the pond also served as the battleground of the freshman and sophomore classes during the Annual Freshman-Sophomore Rope Pull held during Homecoming Week.

But due to the continual circulation of warm water underground, now the pond never freezes solid.

So the joys of skating on the pond and other winter activities during the early years of the pond are now only memories and photographs.

In it's place crop up a new generation of rituals. Every year since 1987, the Reserve Officer Training Corps has constructed a rope bridge over the pond.

Those who are not afraid of getting wet can test their agility and strength. There is also the Annual Spring Concert where thousands of students flock to the edges of the pond to listen to their favorite musicians.

And one must never forget the faithful ducks who would be otherwise homeless without the pond to return to each spring.

As the campus continues to change, the pond will remain a reflection of the past and a part of the future.

graduates] will be down by just over 200 from 1991," she said.

Fitzpatrick said in the fall of 1989, the total number of undergraduates and Stockbridge students was 19,188, while the freshman class had 3,835 students. Both numbers fell significantly in 1990, to 18,037 and 3,581 respectively. Another big drop came in 1991, when undergraduate enrollment fell to 17,271 and the freshman class totalled only 3,303.

In the fall of 1992, though, while the total number of undergraduates fell to 17,066, Fitzpatrick said the entering freshman class is projected to be in the ballpark of Rhinehart's figure of 3,975.

Blaustein agreed that the freshman class is larger than in years past, and attributed it to a pointed effort by the University to reverse the recent sliding trend.

"The acceptance rate is high," she said. "Part of it is the University has made a conscious effort to increase the size of the freshman class. Because of student demographics, the only way to do that was to admit a larger portion of the applicants."

Some fear the admission of a higher percentage of applicants could adversely effect the quality of the University as a whole.

"Yeah, it does effect [quality]," said Fitzpatrick. "Right now, we're about where we were in the early 80s in terms of quality of the freshman class."

Rinehart, however, sees a definite advantage to the increased number of admissions.

"This is the most ethnically and culturally diverse class we've ever had," he said. "My best guess is there are 550 students of color, which is about 14 percent of the entering freshman class. Both these numbers are all-time highs."

Finally, another reminder was sent out last week, according to Whitcomb.

Yet freshman hotel restaurant and travel administration major Sukwon Jung said he did not receive any health form in his foreign student packet.

"I am not on file [on University computers]," Jung said, as he pointed to the letter he received from the University.

"Students need to read the forms carefully. A lot of the time doctors are not reading the forms carefully," Whitcomb said. "Many students are ignoring it [the health forms]. They are hoping it will go away."

a campus wide effort. "Professors are announcing it in their classes and everyone knows about it," said Pavesi.

Wood and Pavesi expects a large percentage of students to register today and tomorrow.

"I think we'll make our goal," Pavesi said. He said there were long lines but that they went by quickly.

"Students were surprised. I had a lot of people thank me," said Pavesi.

Pavesi feels that students want to vote but that it's not convenient. "We bring the registration process to the student."

Voter registration is continuing today and tomorrow in the Cape Cod lounge in the Campus Center from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m.

UHS Launches Automated Switchboard

University Health Services has installed an automated attendant at the telephone switchboard to process calls more quickly and efficiently.

When calling 549-2671, a recorded greeting and menu to various services, clinics and offices will be heard.

By using a touchtone phone, callers will be able to access menu choices by entering numbers on the telephone keypad. Extension numbers can be entered any time after the greeting and the call will be routed directly to the number.

To speak to the UHS operator, callers should press "0" at any time or wait until the end of the message when an operator will come on to the line.

Editorial/Opinion

After Murphy Brown's revenge, Quayle chokes on his foot

I feel revitalized, excited, empowered and frankly victorious — and to think that it took a sitcom to do it. I feel like running up on my roof and screaming, "IN YOUR FACE DAN QUAYLE!" Never has a sitcom given me such a feeling of energy and purpose as "Murphy Brown" just did.

Yes, I know it's only T.V., but there is something very important about the way that episode was produced. It was written as if Murphy Brown was genuine, not just some fictitious character the writers dreamt up. And well, it just magnified the fact that yes, Murphy Brown is real; she represents the millions of women — and men — who have chosen to raise a child on their own. She has just presented us with the fact that families come in all sizes, shapes and forms. From all heritages, ethnicites, religions and sexualities, families have one thing in common — love. Unfortunately Dan Quayle is blind to this notion. That is the notion that a family is not, and never should be, defined only as a mother, father and child.

I find it strange that Quayle has yet to realize the utter disrespect and arrogance his comments conveyed. Anyone who chooses to raise a family on their own, at a time of economic and political turmoil, deserves our respect, support and admiration. They have chosen to go against the odds, against a disturbing public and against our society's standards. They are people of faith and hope, who believe that love can prevail from the societal hatred that breeds in this nation. As far as I'm concerned these people are heroes of their own time.

E. C.
THOMAS

For Dan Quayle to assert that Murphy Brown, or any single parent, is a poor role model for our children is simply inane and quite frankly offensive. For just once I'd like to see Dan Quayle, or any conservative, go against what they've dictated to us as society's norms. To stand alone against unemployment, welfare and a nation that has far too long been run by uncompassionate politicians, who represent ignorance rather than understanding. I'd like to see Dan Quayle take the silver spoon out of his mouth long enough to see what really is going on in this nation. I want him to take a walk through city projects, unemployment lines and belligerent public opinions. I want him to talk with, not about, the sick, homeless and hungry. Only after Quayle singularly feeds, clothes, shelters and medicates his children, while also trying to protect them from stray bullets, infected needles and prejudiced tongues, will I listen to his criticisms.

By blaming Murphy Brown for the decline of family values, he is pushing the problems of our nation under the rug. He and our government seem to be in a state of denial for the problems that they have created. A sitcom can not become the scapegoat for America's predicament.

Restore family values is what they've preached to us. Who's family values are we talking about? God help us if we are to shun those who endure and judge those who love. How can Quayle ignore the plight of those hard working and compassionate human beings who have the courage enough to bring a child into an unaccepting and ignorant world.

This country is supposed to pride itself on being free. Yet, even in the wake of the cold war, we oppress and violate our fellow citizens right to freedom. Freedom to chose to raise a family by oneself is not a matter for public debate. Having a child should not be the focus of a political forum. Having to bring a child into a hateful and turbulent society should be.

Dan Quayle and our government need to leave their fairy tale dream world and wake up to reality. Yes, Dan Quayle does need to take a walk through that unemployment line, indeed.

Knechtle was offering knowledge

It is sad to think that many students' views of Christianity and Cliffe Knechtle will come solely from the seriously flawed article written last Thursday [Collegian, Sept. 17] and the slanted editorial written by David Rivera [Collegian, Sept. 22].

If you listened to Knechtle for any length of time at all then you would know that he was not in the business of converting people, getting people into religion, or condemning anyone. Knechtle offered to answer our questions, not preach, to offer his knowledge of the Bible, not thump it, and he not once asked anyone for their money. In fact on Thursday, the last day, he even gave some away.

If somebody asked, "Why should we believe this — because you say so?" Knechtle was quick to reply, "Don't! But look and decide for yourself." This is not a statement of somebody wishing for a league of blind followers. His only request was that we read the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John with an open mind. Then decide for ourselves if Jesus was a reliable source of information. One can only speculate on the open-mindedness of Mr. Rivera.

If someone is truly interested in investigating the claims of Jesus Christ, I hope that they do not consider yesterday's editorial an accurate treatise on the subject. Rather it is my hope that people seek for themselves. Intervarsity and Alliance Christian Fellowships and Campus Crusade for Christ are all RSOs willing to answer questions at booktables on the Concourse, or at their meetings on campus. Talk to these people to find out what they believe and why.

Much like Cliffe, I do not claim to have all the answers. Perhaps it would be in our best interests to listen to someone like Mr. Rivera who apparently does. . . Perhaps not.

Police help needed after bars close

Where are the police? It seems that they have better things to do like harass local bar owners (and patrons) and trap a few speeders. But where are they when you would really like to see them?

I would like to see them about 1:05 a.m. every Friday and Saturday night when the bars close and 250 to 350 patrons stream into the street, half wandering into Antonio's for a slice or two. It seems that right around this witching hour, strange things happen. The policeman I saw while sitting down enjoying a beer is nowhere to be seen. . . Wait, there he is across the street, in his car next to the fire station and he is probably talking to his buddy who is in his car next to the Heritage Bank.

Now, if you have been keeping score, that's 2-Policeman and 350-Patrons. In a football game, smart money is on the patrons. Wouldn't it be nice to see a couple of them walking up and down the street? General presence seems to make most people more aware of themselves and silly things like brawls, become rarer.

I'm not advocating a police state, but a kinder, gentler after-bar scene. So, a message to all those wanting a quieter uptown: don't close the bars early — get a few policemen on the streets and out of their cars.

Columnist muses on his life standing in line in Amherst

I suppose one of the obligatory columns that a senior editorialist should write could be titled "What I have Learned at UMass." But I won't write one for two reasons: one, it's been done before; two, I've seen far too many people who think they've learned nothing here (with that attitude, they're probably right) and I wouldn't want to waste their precious time.

Luke
ERICKSON

What I can do is write about the things I've told freshmen and high school students about living here at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. Call it "Life at UMass is. . . " for lack of a better title.

- Long lines.
- Hating Route 9 and learning how to avoid it on high-traffic days (afternoons, especially Friday and Moving Days).
- Loving the parking situation, its enforcement, and the parking officials to death.
- Crowded busses, especially first thing in the morning or if it's cold or rainy.
- Long lines.
- Realizing that whatever happens behind closed doors is nobody else's business, no matter what the thought police (R.A.s, R.D.s, etc.) tell you.
- Runny eggs and stale cereal for breakfast at the D.C.
- Using cash machines and laundry machines in the middle of the night.
- Doing your own laundry, perhaps for the first time.
- Falling seriously in love.
- Getting your heart stomped on like a narc at a biker rally.
- Did I mention long lines?
- Squirrels with an attitude.
- Learning that a quarter is worth more than 25 cents.
- Camping out for Minutemen basketball games.
- Pizza whenever you want it.
- When checking the mailbox, remember: no mail = no bills.
- Going to football games to see the marching band.
- Poker/Pitch/Pictionary until three in the morning.
- Taking History 364 with Professor Oates: the best course to satisfy a Gen. Ed.
- Grabbing your keys, I.D., shoes and a jacket for fire alarms.
- Don't forget: long lines.
- Feeding popcorn to the ducks at the Campus Pond.
- Credit card applications from such powerhouse banks like First National of South Dakota.
- Missionaries with 20-foot signs and 110-decibel voices.
- Townies who'll take your money, then complain about "all those damn college kids."
- Coffee houses for both the talented and the untalented.
- Telling the Red Cross: No, Whitmore already got my blood.
- Monday Night Football at the T.O.C.
- Noontime rallies at the Student Union.
- Free shows at the Hatch.
- Packy Runs (translation for EMass natives: a trip to the liquor store).

Hey, those are just some of the wonderful things that make up the quintessential UMass experience. (Oh, did I put "long lines" down?)

Luke Erickson is a UMass student.

Frats are taking misplaced blame

After reading the article about Mace [Collegian, Sept. 22], I see that another semester of "frat bashing" has started. I could write an editorial abut all the good things we do, but I think I will have a better effect if I recount two stories about this last week.

One night last week my house had a small private function which was attended by friends and other Greeks. A group of eight very drunk underclassmen arrived and proceeded to demand entry to my house. After we sent them away, they encountered two woman in the street. A brother then overheard, "Yeah, we're brothers. How would you like it if I kicked your teeth in?" After chasing them away we spent ten minutes explaining to these young women that those guys had nothing to do with us.

Another weekday night I saw two men sitting on our front lawn. They had a small group of women standing around them. As I went out to investigate the women left. The two men explained they were waiting for a ride. After staying with them for a couple of minutes they bolted. Some women came back and said that those two men had told them they were brothers.

In both of these cases men that had nothing to do with my brotherhood had tried to ruin the reputation of my fraternity. This might seem like a small deal to most people, but to an organization as old as ours, it is an outrage. Just because a drunk man says he is in a fraternity does not mean he is. After this week I wonder how many of these "frat incidents" are really that at all.

Implicit campus policy: legalized rape

MEN

It's a casual scene. Lots of friends, and friends of friends. You've met her a few times before, she's nice. You rap about classes, majors, campus life, and even some politics. You both mingle throughout the evening.

She's walking home alone so you offer to join her. As you walk you look at her, all of her. You begin to see her naked in bed. Your pants itch. At the door she invites you in.

You made it. Inside, alone, music, she looks even better now. Turn on the charm, ring out the compliments, rub up against her. You're here, with her, alone, she must want it. You're too stiff to turn back.

Kiss, kiss. Squeeze. Onto the bed. Pull her hand into your pants. Drive your tongue deep so she's not too loud. Put all your weight on her. Don't let her turn sideways. O.K. the pants, just get them past her knees, hold her down with your other hand. Now, unzip your pants, hurry. Squeeze your knees between hers and push. "It's O.K. baby, it's all right, it's all right, I love you, really."

You got off, you leave. You scored, the guys will think highly, you're cool. But you feel just a slight bit funny. So you convince yourself. "You were friends, she had a few drinks, she wanted to get laid." But what if she tells her friends? Nahh! Besides they all know you're a nice guy.

What are the chances that people would believe her? Extremely low. What are the chances that she will report it? Extremely low. What are the chances that she could win a case and you would be justly sentenced? Zero. What are the consequences of raping her? Zero.

Do you realize that you forced yourself inside her? That she showered three times to cleanse herself of you? That she probably feels dirty, cheap, and ashamed? That what you interpreted as sex was actually rape?

But she's afraid to tell anyone because you would deny it, because her friends saw you two flirting, because everyone had a few drinks that night. And she's afraid they will blame her.

What about the authorities? Who at UMass could she call, the police? Would they believe her? Would they just make her fill out papers and file a report? Would it turn into a long investigation, to prove she wasn't lying? This would only humiliate her and her family.

MALE PROFESSORS
(staff, administrators, and TAs)

Some of the girls in class caught your eye. Affirm their answers and comments, then wait for the office hours. Look for the one who worships your intellect the most. Praise her's too.

Teach, preach, espouse, depart your wisdom, advise, guide, nourish, cradle, close the office door.

The fact is, the administration has not been and is not serious about preventing rape on campus. It focuses mostly on healing the aftermath of rape and it actively propagandizes the illusion of safety for women.

Talk circles around her head, amaze and bewilder her with your knowledge, drown her into a sea of dizziness with your superior mind, until she's at your total intellectual mercy. Quickly, before she regains balance, catch her off guard with a sly compliment on her hair, her eyes, or her legs. Before her surprise and confusion subside, put your hand on her. Lock the office door.

You're a professor, she's a student. What if she told her friends? They'll think it's incredible. What if they start rumors? Well, it's not the first time and you're not the first one so it'll go unnoticed.

Besides, you'll brag to your male colleagues anyway! What about the wife and kids? You ultimately love them so that's what counts. Besides, how could you pass up this fresh piece of ass? You're too stiff now. Go for it. Now teach her your sexual wisdom and expertise!

What are the consequenses of [professors] raping this young student? Zero. . . young women students are simply a fringe benefit of the male academy. . .

You've left her with the biggest secret in the world. She slept with her professor who is more than twice her age. She doesn't understand why it happened. She thought you were incredibly knowledgable, a genius. She had all the respect in the world for you. Class was always interesting. You were easy to talk to. Always made yourself available to her.

She had never imagined anything like this. You could be her father. How did it happen? One minute you were talking about class, the next you're all over her. She thought you closed the door because of the noise. She didn't realize you locked it. But she trusted her professor. She thought she knew you. She couldn't even think. She was afraid to say no! You were too overwhelming, too overpowering. She didn't want to. She never wanted it. You made her do it.

Alexander
NGUYEN

Who can she talk to? Who can she tell? Who would believe her? It would be your word against her's, a professor's against a student's. She is afraid you will do it again, that you expect it. How can she go back to class?

You would simply deny it. She came to your office. She didn't say no. She didn't scream for help. She didn't tell anyone immediately. She was in your office. What are the chances she would be believed? Extremely low. What are the chances your career would be jeopardized? Extremely low. What are the consequences of raping this young student? Zero.

MEN

Have you ever been accused of rape? Probably never. What about any of your friends? Probably none. But you've forced women into sex. Maybe you didn't beat them, make them cry, or think you hurt them, but you know you forced them. Although you believe it wasn't really rape.

But it's not a crime anyway because everybody does it and the women never complain. So it must be O.K. How can women feel safe with you in any circumstance anymore? Have any of their friends reported rapes on campus? Probably none. Have they ever known of any men to be convicted of rape on campus? Probably never. Can they trust the University to protect them? No. Are they safe on campus? No. Have there ever been any consequences for you? None. What are the chances you'll stop next time? No way.

MALE PROFESSORS
(staff, administrators, and TAs)

The seduction and conquest leaves you insatiable and drooling. Every year a new batch of young, impressionable women seek knowledge and experience. Thus you are thy teacher and must perform thy duties.

How many of your colleagues have had sexual harassment charges filed against them? Actually, a few. But the risk ratio is too low to be preventive. Young women students are simply a fringe benefit of the male academy on top of academic freedom. Besides, you've probably lost interest in your wives.

Has the University assisted any students in bringing charges against you? No. Have you any reason to stop charming the pants off students? Of course not.

NO CONSEQUENCES

These are but two examples of rapes occurring at the University of Massachusetts every day, every semester, every year. Although rape is against the law, those laws are not respected or feared by men because they are rarely enforced on our campus. The University enforces alcohol laws more seriously and swiftly than rape, when it enforces rape laws at all.

Men only fear rape laws in the abstract. They would think twice about robbing a store but not before raping a woman because the University cares more about stolen computers. How could this be true? It isn't in University rhetoric, but in practice. When men who rape never have to face the consequences, they continue to do so and thus reinforce in all men that though there are written laws, there are no actual consequences. In effect, the University has given men the green light. This campus is a turkey shoot, a grazing ground, where men have the implicit license to rape. Students, TAs, staff, administrators, and faculty, it's a free-for-all, go for it.

Men only fear rape laws in the abstract. They would think twice about robbing a store but not before raping a woman because the University cares more about stolen computers.

The line of defense is, simply put, the University can not enforce the law unless the incident is reported. With this criminal reasoning (and excuse) the University stomachs this vulgar brutality of legalized rape and plays the eternal ostrich when it comes to the safety of women on campus.

It is so uncaring that it hasn't even taken the academic escape of requiring a mandatory Rape and Violence Against Women workshop. Although this would surely be converted into another ineffectual multicultural celebration of peace and equality of civil rights between men and women.

Why is the administration so callous and immoral? Or are they administrating this Rape Club thus enforcing the law would be a conflict of interest to Club members?

The fact is, the administration has not been and is not serious about preventing rape on campus. It focuses mostly on healing the aftermath of rape and it actively propagandizes the illusion of safety for women on campus.

Men simply have nothing to fear. A good time is a good time, sex is sex, women are everywhere, the police are nowhere. Safe sex is a campus wide issue but coerced and/or forced sex is not.

As long as men believe there are no consequences, rape is not a crime but their right. And the administration continues to empower men with this right, by continuing this implicit policy of legalized rape on campus.

Why is this happening? How can men freely rape women all over campus like this, boast about it, feel good about it, and never pay the price? How is nobody held responsible, students, staff, TAs, faculty, or administrators? Is there a University Rape Club?

Why is the administration so callous and immoral? Or are they administrating this Rape Club thus enforcing the law would be a conflict of interest to Club members?

Mr. Lupo revels in Husband's emotional spin

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Husbands and Wives

Woody Allen is back in what is arguably his best film since Hannah and Her Sisters, Husbands And Wives. In light of recent events, it has never been more apparent how deeply personal each of his films are. It shows especially in Husbands And Wives, a magnificently acted, scripted and directed film that's easily one of the best of the year.

Allen plays Gabe Roth, a writing professor at Columbia who is married to Judy, played by Mia Farrow (who else?) Out of the blue their best friends, Jack (Sydney Pollack) and Sally (Judy Davis) announce they are splitting up.

Just weeks later, Jack is already living with an astrology-awed, health conscious and all-around younger woman Sam (Lysette Anthony) while Judy fixes up a reluctant Sally with a co-worker Michael (Liam Neeson), a man Judy really likes. Meanwhile, Gabe becomes increasingly attracted to Rain (Juliette Lewis), a twenty year-old woman who is one of his students.

The result is part farce and part tragicomedy. Allen places all the characters on an unpredictable emotional spin that's engrossing to watch. The storylines could have easily led to melodrama, yet Allen plays them for their true comic potential.

Allen and director of photography Carlo Di Palma use a shaky, free-wheeling camera technique that's so absorbing it pulls the viewer right into the character's lives. While the style may be jarring at first, it adds an almost voyeuristic appeal.

There is a narrator that's not seen and the characters are routinely "interviewed" as if on a documentary. It's a technique that's been used before but never seemed as fresh and exciting.

Husbands and Wives boasts some of the best ensemble work that can be done. Woody Allen is less neurotic here, but his character's (and perhaps his own) flaws are more apparent. There's also an undercurrent of truth that is painfully obvious. Husbands and Wives could be seen as a catharsis for Allen and this makes the film more personal.

Mia Farrow has either turned in a perfect performance or she's not acting. It has been reported that the whole scandal surrounding Allen and Farrow's 21-year-old adopted daughter began during the filming of Husbands and Wives. So it is a wonder if her fight scenes and all around "betrayed" attitude in this film had real-life counterparts. Either way, she's fantastic here and deserves an Oscar nomination.

Also worthy is the continually excellent Judy Davis (Naked Lunch, Where Angels Fear To Tread), getting a well-deserved reputation for being one of the finest actresses around. Her character is in an almost bitchy state of denial for the entire film. Her performance is a comedic triumph.

Oscar-winning director Sydney Pollack (Out of Africa) gives a deft, intelligent performance. He has the makings of a credible dual career. Juliette Lewis (Cape Fear) shows she's no fluke with her smart turn as the student who has been around. She has a way of making you dislike the character while still liking her. There were also funny performances from Lysette Anthony (Switch) as Jack's other woman and Ron Rifkin as Rain's other man (of sorts).

Husbands and Wives signals a positive turn in Allen's career after his last two films, a disappointing effort with Alice and a downright fumble with Shadows and Fog. Husbands and Wives is right up there with Allen classics Manhattan and Annie Hall. Don't miss this wonderful film.

An experiment: Attitude A argues with Attitude B about The Best Album Ever Made.

After several hours, nothing has happened except now both their voices are hoarse. Attitude A is still convinced of the superlative nature of Album A. On the other hand Attitude B, who now thinks A is a moron, remains a believer in his own music.

I say they're both missing the point.

Tom Ardolino, Springfield-based drummer for the superlative band NRBQ (plug), may have his own notion about The Best Album Ever Made, and I may have mine. But it doesn't matter.

I spoke with Tom about a passion of his — abysmally horrible record albums.

Wait. Don't turn to another article yet. We're just getting started.

Before you flip the page to Calvin and Hobbes, allow one further interjection: this article will basically sing the praises of wax you might see on Late Night's "Dave's Record Collection." No Rick Astley here, man.

"It seems there aren't enough people who appreciate the truly horrible. You know, the unintentionally hilarious," I began.

Tom, who probably should have delivered that line himself, concurred. "God, there sure aren't. Most people either think you're strange or they just don't get it."

(Incidentally, Tom has lent his knowledge and

Freddie & Eddie suckin' Wind

By FRANK BOUDREAU (Freddie)
GREG ALEXANDER (Eddie)
Collegian Correspondents

There's a new hit on the movie review syndicate. We're neither fat nor bald nor 40 years old trying to tell you what's good or bad. We are Freddie and Eddie, the new gurus on what is hot and not at the local cinema.

How often have you casually dropped a quarter for the paper to check out the scoop on the new flicks only to find a pseudo-intellectual giving his or her oh so intricate review of a new film? They insist on trying to educate the educated on the art of filmmaking.

Who wants to read that? Freddie and Eddie are here to save the movie goers of our generation. Freddie and Eddie were born after JFK's assassination and are hip to what's hip. When Saturday night rolls around and your boyfriend or girlfriend wants to go out but there's only a ten spot in your 501's, hold true to an American tradition. Check out a movie, and let us help you choose it.

It's a damn shame that men of our stature must begin on a down right farce of a film. However, that's all right because we understand that our editors just met us and have yet to realize how cool we are. Wind, starring Matthew Modine and Jennifer Grey, supposedly an action packed boating film, merely left us bobbing in the water.

Not exactly a smashing opening but it will allow the readers to understand our attitudes. We either love a film, therefore deeming it Stupendous, or hate a film and therefore deem it Horrendous.

This week save your nickels and dimes and go to Antonio's for a slice and a Coke. Wind was utterly boring and un-entertaining. Japanese film producer Mata Yomahata might understand the equations to make film but has yet to grasp the formula to produce a movie.

Wind was horrendous for many reasons. Let us count the ways. First, the movie was PG-13 and contained little stimulation for our demographic age group. Secondly, though Jennifer Grey was hot, Modine lacked the savvy to pull it off. Thirdly, Wind was trying to be a Top Gun on the water. However, they forgot the essential ingredients: great music, a cool motorcycle and of course the leading man.

Finally, all its comedic attempts failed dramatically which left the audience without any popcorn and nothing to laugh about. In fact the plot was an insult to intelligent ticket buyers. Once again Hollywood stays with the old formula of boy meets girl, boy loses girl and boy gets girl back after she left him for some slob. Throw in sporadic attempts of suspense on the high waters and behold, Wind's story line is born.

The quality of the performances by both Modine and Grey provide inspiration to those of us who dream of movie star status; arguing that if those two bleach blondes can get there, than certainly two young naturals such as Freddie and Eddie can also.

In what was supposed to be a thrilling ending, Modine appeared to have swallowed one too many Dramamine tablets. As for Grey, she contributed to today's sexism problem for she was merely a trophy for the man currently on top.

As depressing a start as this may be, at least we can save you some time and money. Wind wasn't worth the price of admission. Our advice to you is to hold off this week but stay tuned. When a good movie comes out and we are allowed to tell you about it, Freddie and Eddie will advise you to bring that student I.D. and buy a box of Ju-Ju Bees. Until then, loosen up those buttons on that remote control you pay for every month.

Phantom of the Opera

Boston's Wang Center hosts ghosts

By PETER PLOURDE
Special to the Collegian

Andrew Lloyd Webber's timeless rendition of Gaston Leroux's classic The Phantom of the Opera is currently haunting the majestic halls of the historic Boston Wang Center. This international award winning musical is filled with enough top notch opera, ballet and special effects to silence even the most stubborn critic. Other than the $30 ticket price to see the musical, there is no room for negative comments. The Phantom is absolutely spectacular.

The newly renovated Wang Center, modeled after the Paris Opera Comique, is the perfect spot for this French romance. The grand lobby of the Wang Center is itself a model of the palace of Versailles, with marble columns, ceiling frescoes, and abundant gold leafing. The theatre instantly takes the audience back to turn of the century France (the setting for this production). Once the show begins it is hard to differentiate the theatre from the many props this production brings. The blend is perfect and the result is brilliance.

Kevin Gray, the actor who plays the Phantom, and Teri Bibb, who plays Christine, are both vocally blessed and powerful. The supporting cast all had unique personalities that kept the whole show interesting, and a wonderful orchestra filled the Center with Andrew Lloyd Webber's own music.

The story itself is a classic love triangle involving Christine, whom the Phantom trains to sing all of his songs, and Raoul — Christine's other love, besides her music — the knight in shining duck tails.

The Phantom is a grotesquely disfigured man possessed by both the opera and Christine, his sweet young virtuoso. The Phantom, ashamed of his appearance, masks half his face to hide his gruesome profile. When Christine becomes too curious, she rips off his mask and the Phantom flies into a maniacal frenzy, throwing her into a dungeon and claiming her as his prize. Without weapons, Raoul attempts a rescue. This whole show has advanced special effects, including a 1000 pound chandelier (triggered to some advance pyrotechnics) that lowers from the ceiling during the opera.

All this, along with the most fluid set changes you could ever imagine, captivates the audience for the whole duration of the show. The set changes are intricate and advanced, yet done in a swooping magical fashion. The set becomes an additional character that we look forward to seeing in all its new roles. The totality and harmony of the production were awe-inspiring. You can only imagine the thousands of hours of work involved in this piece of Broadway brought to Boston.

If you would like to see the play, you can charge tickets by phone at 931-2000. The theatre is located on Tremont Street in Boston, with an adjacent parking garage.

commonness among the Jewish people.

For example, American Jews joke about crazy Israeli cab drivers, something that is removed from their daily lives but still resonates within their common background. Rabbi Telushkin said this "reflects a Jewish sensitivity".

Telushkin covered political views by portraying Jewish Zionistic humor and the view of the Jews on the left vs. those on the right. In addition, he discussed antisemitic humor and how other groups see the Jewish people and Jews in general.

Although Jewish history is depressing and full of hardship, Telushkin said Jewish humor leaves the Jewish people with an optimistic view of the future.

Telushkin was asked if he could sum up his speech in a few words.

"How can one sentence capture the essence of Jewish humor?" he said.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April): Taking the line of least resistance will put you behind the eight ball. Stand up for your ideas! A courageous attitude will help you make giant career strides.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Positive health changes boost your sprits. Your knees or back could be involved. Risky financial schemes can backfire. Keep your money in the bank! Your romantic partners may need to show more maturity.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A rewarding personal alliance can be launched or strengthened today. Do the right thing even it tempted to take the easy way out. Indulge your interest in good music or literature tonight.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Good ideas catch on fast once you light a match under those who are complacent. Loved ones are enthusiastic about a special trip or reunion. Do not let them down.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You are in for a busy day. Get things organized and keep moving! A family member could stall on repayment of a loan. A luxury purchase may have to be postponed.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A good time to refine your plans and shop for values. Proceed with caution where a romantic interest is concerned. There could be risks involved.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Fill your schedule with talks and trips; your efficiency almost guarantees that things will go smoothly. A home shopping show or catalogue gives you a clever idea.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A brainstorming session leads to brilliant ideas and mutually beneficial agreements. You are an expert in the language of love. Do those little things that mean so much.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A terrific surprise awaits you. It may be in the form of money. A purchase, proposal or blossoming alliance. You will want to be open to anything.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Be careful not to hug something you should share with others. A generous attitude will win widespread approval. Go ahead and purchase a labor-saving device. You will get your money's worth.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Community activities bring both public recognition and deep satisfaction. Your interest in music or art could put you in line for a special assignment.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Listening to gossip is a real time-waster. To conquer the world, you must maintain a positive attitude. Cricket competition get you down. Stick to your carefully laid plans.

record collection to several cornerstones in the genre. He contributed to the research and assembly of the second volume of Rhino Records' Golden Throats series — both volumes come highly recommended. He also masterminded Beat Of The Traps, a worst-of the "Send us your poetry, we'll put it to music" recordings from the late 1960's. Carnage Press Records, at P.O. Box 627 in Northampton, currently handles the compilation's distribution.)

Discussion first centered on favorites of late.

"I've been getting into a lot of easy listening stuff recently. It seems everyone's been unloading their collections at Goodwill," he offered, conjuring unsettling images of blue-haired ladies lined up in a two-block long queue to dump their Sergio Mendes And Brasil 66 records.

"The Castaway Strings have this album called The Elvis Presley Songbook which has a cover of 'Tutti Frutti' [by Little Richard] on it for some reason. Just sick."

Flipping through my own goldmine of cheese, I tossed out thoughts that might provoke reaction.

What about the realm of myopic jingoism? (Always a bountiful harvest.) "Yeah . . .Everett McKinley Dirksen [ex-Senator from Illinois]. He's got a few records out. Victor Lundberg too [who hit it big in 1967 with `An Open Letter To My Teenage Son'], although I think I may have sold that one."

I mention that both Dirksen and Lundberg albums are sitting by my turntable, ready to be played in a second's notice in case a surge of anti-American thoughts enters my upstanding, young noggin. We're obviously speaking the same demented language.

Overrated celebrities? "Dick Clark has this album called The Fable of Fun Country that defies explanation. You just gotta hear it."

As we talk, I run across a few gems worth mentioning.

We Gather Together by Tennessee Ernie Ford and The San Quentin Choir: "I have that one too. Hadda buy it for the cover alone. It's like one big picture of him and all those prisoners."

Barry Tiffin's "Candy Bars For Elvis": "That was the song that sold me on an Elvis tribute CD. I saw the title and immediately knew I needed it."

Sound effects and mood records? "They can be good; they can be boring. Depends. The cheaper-looking the better."

More than once did we punctuate our telephone conversation with the line, "You just gotta hear it."

Field hockey on a roll

No. 5 ranked team wins sixth in a row

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team had a double stroke of good fortune Tuesday: they beat Stanford University 3-1 at Parsons Field in Brookline and surged to No. 5 in the new NCAA poll.

Ainslee Press scored just moments into the second half to break a 1-1 tie as the Minutewomen (6-0) regrouped and were able to rebound from a sluggish first 35 minutes. Massachusetts finished Stanford (0-3) off about 10 minutes later when Danielle Borges fed Tara Jelley and gave UMass the 3-1 edge.

While Stanford came into the game unranked, they were able to keep up with UMass in the first half. Head coach Pam Hixon said she wasn't surprised with what she saw.

"They aren't the best team from out West because they graduated everyone after last year," said Hixon. "But they gave us the kind of game I expected."

The action began when freshman Andrea Cabral scored her first collegiate goal on a play assisted by forward Jenn Salisbury. Cabral, who was inserted as a left midfielder, gave the Massachusetts squad a 1-0 lead that would be erased on a bad hop.

Stanford came back right before the half to tie things up 1-1 when the team scored on a mishit penalty corner. The shot hit a seam on the turf and bounced up over everybody, Hixon said.

"It was one of those nightmarish goals," she said. "It was tough for us to get going. I don't think we played very well."

With a stagnant first half and a tie score, UMass had reason to be concerned. But the Minutewomen were able to execute enough in the second half to take the win back to Amherst.

The goal in the second half was the fourth game-winner this year by Press, a newcomer on the Minutewomen squad. Just as reassuring for the team was their shutdown of the Cardinal offense, which only mustered one shot in the second half.

Cross country beats two in meet

By GWENDOLYN McLAURIN
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country team opened the 1992 season in fine fashion, defeating two out of the three teams that participated in the meet last Saturday at Franklin Park in Boston.

On the losing end were Boston College and Northeastern, who hosted the meet. Only Iona College, who is rated in the NCAA top 25 poll, was able to contain the strength and ability of UMass.

This was the second meet for all of the teams except UMass, which seemed to give the other teams a slight advantage but coach Ken O'Brien did not feel that that was a factor.

"I think that we actully overcame that little bit of a deficit of running a first meet," he said. "We overcame that with what I thought was a real strong middle part of our race."

As expected, seniors Matt Simon and Pat Reed along with junior Craig Cormier ran a strong race finishing eighth, ninth and tenth overall. Simon ran the five-mile course in 26 minutes and 2 seconds while Reed and Cormier were just one second behind him at 26 minutes and 3 seconds.

What was not expected was the strong finishes by Scott Sykes and Brian Cox. Sykes placed seventeenth and Cox came in right behind in nineteenth place. Cox was coming off a layoff and O'Brien said he didn't know what expect from them.

"Those guys did a great job going home this summer and preparing themselves so that they could be counted on throughout the season," O'Brien said.

O'Brien was also impressed by the efforts of Kevin Greenhalgh, Ben Benoit, and Jonah Backstrum. He was especially pleased with the strong showing of newcomer Benoit, who just transferred from the University of Maine.

"I think our strength was in the way we came through on the third and fourth mile and that probably is going to be the strength of the team over the course of the season," O'Brien said. "We are more of what I would call a strength team and that worked well for us this week. I think it is going to be our focus and we will continue to work on that," replied Coach O'Brien when asked what he felt was the reason for the team's success at the meet.

Other new NHL tidbits include a new TV contract with ESPN and rules designed to cut down on unneccesary fighting.

ESPN's coverage of hockey, particularly the playoffs, was marvelous when the network last worked with the NHL in 1988. Studio host Tom Mees knew what he was talking about, as did Mike Emerick and Bill Clement, the network's play-by-play/color team.

Additionally, the network provided excellent camera work during games, breaking away from the traditional high-mounted side-to-side single camera coverage hockey usually gets. Also, when controversy arose, such as the infamous Garden blackout, ESPN was right there to bring the story. Serious hockey fans should be ecstatic that the NHL finally lived down one of it's worst mistakes and moved back to ESPN.

As for fighting rules, the jury's still out until real-game experience proves if they work. Some think it's a bad idea to cut down on one of the league's bigger drawing cards — blood-thirsty fans love fights — but then again, maybe the rules will also curtail some of the dumber violence that takes out players like Mario Lemieux and Neely.

Yankee Conference notebook

UMass' Albert captures player of the week honors

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

Week three of the 1992 Yankee Conference football season is now in the books, and Delaware has grabbed the early season lead for the Beanpot, compiling a 2-0 YanCon record with this weekend's 31-14 victory over Rhode Island.

Close behind the Blue Hens are Connecticut and Villanova, each with identical 1-0 YanCon marks. Maine comes in fourth this week with a 1-1 mark, while Boston University sits alone in fifth place with a 0-0 YanCon mark (0-2 overall).

YANKEE CONFERENCE

Massachusetts, Richmond and Rhode Island jockey for position in a three-way tie for sixth, with 0-1 marks, while New Hampshire plays cellar-dweller in this week's YanCon standings.

Kudos to UMass' Ben Albert, who was named Yankee Conference/US Air defensive player of the week for his effort in Saturday's 7-3 win over Holy Cross. The sophomore nose tackle from Paterson, NJ scored the game's only touchdown on his 17-yard first quarter interception return, while recovering a Holy Cross fumble with 1:42 to play in addition to making two tackles.

Rob Boothes of Richmond was named the YanCon/US Air offensive player of the week for his three touchdown effort in last weekend's loss to YanCon foe Villanova.

Rookie of the week honors went to Eric Hunt out of Villanova, who rushed for 105 yards on nine carries while scoring one touchdown against Jim Marshall's Richmond squad.

The new Division 1-AA poll came out yesterday morning, and the YanCon is well represented with Villanova (Number 3) and Delaware (Number 7) cracking the top ten this week.

Villanova and Delaware head the list of YanCon teams in the hunt for the Lambert-Meadowlands Trophy for the top team in the Northeast, running 1-2 in this weeks poll.

Richmond comes in at fifth in this week's poll, while UMass and Maine round out the top ten in the race for Eastern supremacy.

Speaking of the Minutemen, coach Mike Hodges squad hosts BU this weekend in the home opener at McGuirk Alumni Stadium, in what promises to be a festive atmosphere as tailgating returns to Amherst after a five year hiatus.

UMass comes into the game fresh off its 7-3 victory over Holy Cross, hoping to carry over some of the emotion displayed after Hodges first career victory last Saturday.

The Minutemen's defense has been the team's strength thus far, and should carry the team throughout the season.

Quietly leading the ferocious UMass defense has been junior linebacker Phil Lartigue who recorded twelve tackles against Holy Cross, giving him thirty on the '92 campaign.

Offensively, the Minutemen lost starting quarterback Andrew McNeilly and starting tailback John Johnson to injury last week, although neither injury is considered serious and both are expected to see action this week.

Speaking of injuries, it appears that Mario Perry has fully recovered from last season's ankle injury, as Perry played with reckless abandon at Fitton Field, recording six tackles while sacking Crusader QB Andy Fitzpatrick three times. Perry's partner and linebacker, Scott Assencoa has also played well as of late, recording eight tackles last week.

Unbeaten UM faces Dartmouth

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

A path which consists of three straight huge games on the road is not a path many coaches like to travel.

For Sam Koch, head coach of the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team, it is the path he and his squad must travel.

The Minutemen (5-0) opened up the three-game trip with a thrilling 3-1 overtime victory over Rhode Island. Up next for UMass is the Ivy League's Dartmouth Big Green.

The Big Green enter Wednesday's contest with a 2-1 record. After dropping their opening game to Hartford, Dartmouth has come on to win their last two against Vermont and Pennsylvania, with the latter coming in overtime.

Leading the Big Green attack is senior Geoffrey Wheeler. Wheeler has scored two goals and assisted on another. Senior Justin Head is the other main gun for Dartmouth, with two goals himself.

Between the pipes for Dartmouth is Brian Wiese. While Wiese has allowed six goals in the three games, it should be noted that four of them came in the opening loss to Hartford.

A key for the Minutemen could be a quick start. Against URI, the Minutemen came out flat and had to come from behind for the victory. For the majority of the game, the Minutemen was in control of the play on the field.

A big reason for the UMass success is their overall depth (eleven players have a point for UMass). Koch is really satisfied with the team as a whole.

"One thing I've said is that our second team really makes us a good team," Koch said. "There are about four players, who could start for us, and there are guys who can definitely play, they help make us go."

An underrated part of the UMass squad is their defense. For the most part, the Minutemen have wrapped up their opponents.

Sophomore goalie Mark Wolf has been stupendous in net for UMass thus far. Wolf has thirty saves on the year and has a 0.88 goals against average, thus making the loss of star goalie Jon Gruber a little easier to swallow.

Game notes: In the New England Division 1 poll, the Minutemen are ranked fourth while the Big Green is seventh. On Saturday, the Minutemen will travel to Rutgers to play the Scarlet Knights.

UMass freshman Colin Johnson was named Atlantic 10 Soccer Rookie of the Week.

Poor Patriots sour Boston sports scene

I couldn't begin without a well-deserved round of cheap shots at the expense of the New England Patriots.

Who could turn the pathetic Rams into a defensive powerhouse? Who could make the Seahawks a Super Bowl contender? Who, and I'm serious now, might not win a single game all season long?

The Patriots. Snicker, guffaw, chortle, chuckle or do one of those "ha-ha-ha ha ha!" Woody Woodpecker deals, because the Patriots have the potential to provide more laughs than any re-run of Car 54, Where Are You until the holidays.

What the hell, New England sports fans need a laugh. Cam Neely had more cartilege removed from his knee (he still had some left?), Larry Legend has a desk job and the Red Sox death watch is on. There's got to be something to feel good about.

So why not bust on the Pats?

Greg
SUKIENNIK

As a die-hard Bills fan (yes, I work that into as many sports pieces as I can) I feel good about Buffalo's chances to cover the spread this weekend against a team which normally gives them fits. As you may recall, last year the Pats benefitted from four Jim Kelly interceptions, posting a 16-13 win at the Foxboro Concrete Castle. But this season, Patriots quarterback Hugh Millen hasn't had time to throw, and he'll be facing a healthy, more destructive than ever Bruce Smith.

The spread has the Bills by 15. Bet your house on it.

Hazy shade of winter: It may be warm and muggy outside, but since when does sense have anything to do with what the National Hockey League does? The exhibition season has already started, and teams will be skating for real by the first week in October.

What makes less sense than hockey in warm weather? Hockey in Jacksonville, Fla. and Atlanta. The Bruins play nearly half their exhibition schedule in the deep South, where ice can naturally be found in five-pound bags in supermarkets.

Paint it black: Looking for big NHL trends? Look for a return to a traditional favorite in hockey fashion, the classic beauty and simplicity of basic black. Both the Ottawa Senators and Tampa Bay Lightning will be donning the dark stuff this season, following the simplest logic in sports — if someone's doing it, so should you.

Tampa's duds look pretty good, but the Senators' uniforms are ug-lee. You play like you look, and with that in mind send a sympathy card to former Bruins' boss Rick Bowness, who has the mounumental task of making the Sens a hockey team in the Adams, the toughest division in the NHL.

Women's soccer puts winning streak on the line vs. Harvard

JOSH REYNOLDS/ COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team squares off against Harvard today at 3:00 p.m. at Garber Field. UMass is looking for their sixth win in a row.

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy should not have too much trouble motivating his team for today's match up (3 p.m. on Richard F. Garber Field) with the Harvard Crimson.

First off, the Minutewomen (5-0) will be looking to avenge last season's 1-0 upset loss at the hands of the Crimson (2-1).

"The team has been looking forward to this one," Rudy said. "They were talking about it last week as they prepared for the Rutgers game. They definitely want some revenge."

In last year's meeting, Harvard was able to score just before halftime and stymie the Massachusetts attack for the rest of the game.

"We just couldn't get one back," Rudy said. "We dominated the play but they did a nice job tactically and played to their absolute potential."

A second motivational tool for Rudy is this week's Gatorade Top 20 rankings. Massachusetts, despite remaining unbeaten, dropped a notch in the poll from No. 9 to No. 10. The team which jumped ahead of them is a William and Mary squad which Massachusetts already defeated 1-0 this season.

"It is disappointing," Rudy said. "You beat a team and then you end up under them in the rankings. The poll really is not that important but it helps to receive the respect. I will let the team know about the polls today."

If the lack of pollsters' respect does not do the trick, Rudy can always turn to keeping Massachusetts' five-game winning streak alive.

"We are off to a good start," Rudy said. "We are not going to look to the past though, we have to keep winning it one game at a time. You can not try to have a winning streak, they just happen."

Motivation aside, Massachusetts will have to win the game on the field against a decent Harvard squad.

Returning in net for Harvard coach Tim Wheaton is Brooke Donahoe, who shut out Massachusetts last season. Donahoe is 2-1 on the season with a 1.00 goals against average.

"Donahoe played a great game against us last year," Rudy said. "She is athletic and capable of putting it all together."

Rudy will counter with Skye Eddy in net. Eddy and Briana Scurry have done well adapting to a rotation system which, according to Rudy, can be "difficult". Eddy is 2-0 with a 1.00 goals against average for the season.

Room shortage leaves many out in cold

• Enrollment jump blamed

By VANESSA ADELMAN
Collegian Correspondent

Joe Martin had been in line since 4:30 a.m. yesterday waiting for the Housing Assignment Office to open at 8:30 a.m. so he could clinch a spot for a room in a residence hall.

Martin, a sophomore Japanese major, is one of the 490 students this semester at the University of Massachusetts who arrived at school with no place to unpack their bags.

Housing Services sent Martin a letter this summer telling him his housing assignment had been dropped. When he called to find out the reason, Housing Services said he hadn't filled out his housing preference card.

Although Martin says he filled out the card, the Housing Assignments Office told him they would do the best they could to try to get him his room.

"I went on Monday, Sept. 7, to Housing and they gave me a lounge to stay in temporarily. A swing room. I asked them how long I would be there, if I could swap, and if they knew where I would be going," said Martin. "They gave me no answers — a complete run-around, and told me to come back on Thursday. I went back and they still had no answers."

Martin's swing room is a residence hall lounge made into a room for students to stay in temporarily. The cramped living space for three students includes three beds, two desks and a bureau. There are no closets and very little room to put any belongings.

Martin says he's tired of living out of a suitcase.

Fifty juniors and seniors didn't get a room until Thursday, Sept. 10, according to housing officials. Underclassmen are prioritized in room placement because housing assumes that upperclassmen can make accom-

Moving into new residence halls at the start of a new school year usually causes great excitement.

For the residents of the John F. Kennedy tower in Southwest, however, there was a completely different type of feeling.

Instead of finding a welcome new home, they were trying to find an answer to why they were placed in temporary housing. After three weeks of school many of them have lost hope in finding a new assignment and are forced to make the best of what they have.

Although JFK was scheduled to be closed for renovations this semester, a greater number of incoming freshman entered the University than was originally expected.

When the University's Housing Services Office made projections for enrollment, statistics from traditional enrollment rates were used. This led Housing to expect significantly lower occupancy, according to Dr. Joseph Zannini, the executive director of Housing Services.

By closing unneeded halls, Housing hoped to utilize the time for refurbishment and avoid "passing on the open buildings' costs to the students," said Zannini.

Originally JFK was meant to be temporary housing with no more than 300 students, according to Stephanie Carnahan, the residence director of the hall.

However, when the number of students kept increasing the decision was made to open it completely. Although Housing officials say they were looking at the students' interests by doing this, many residents say they are upset with the situation.

"Housing should have admitted to their mistake instead of making us feel like we should be grateful for a

MIA/POW documents made available to public

By JOHN DIAMOND
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The U.S. envoy walked into the secret Paris meeting room carrying a proposal from President Nixon for billions in aid to North Vietnam. The Vietnamese envoy had a list of 10 POWs held in Laos.

In an exchange that reflects the bitter mistrust between the two nations, each diplomat clutched his own document tightly and traded papers in a simultaneous grab. The tale of two decades ago unfolds in declassified documents made public this week as part of the Senate hearings into the fate of American prisoners and missing soldiers in Vietnam.

At issue in the Feb. 1, 1973, exchange were two documents that have drawn the attention of the Senate Select Committee on POW-MIA Affairs: a letter from Nixon to then-North Vietnamese Prime Minister Pham Van Dong promising at least $4.25 billion in postwar aid and a list compiled by North Vietnam of known POWs held by communists in neighboring Laos.

Air Force Col. George Guay, who served as a messenger during the Paris peace talks, described the 4 p.m. meeting with his North Vietnamese counterpart, Vo Van Sung, code-named "Customer," in an eyes-only cable the same day to Gen. Brent Scowcroft, then a White House aide.

"I exchanged the president's memorandum for the list of U.S. prisoners in Laos with Customer at 1600 Paris time today," Guay reported. "When I arrived he made a grab for the envelope containing the message, and, without breaking his fingers, I told him that my instructions

Janitors question shifts

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

Campus Center and Student Union janitors say they feel they are understaffed and overworked to the point of exhaustion and believe the solution to the problem is to hire more permanent staff.

Steve, who has been a janitor for 11 years, said over Labor day weekend he worked a total of forty hours because of the shortage of staff on the night shift. "I didn't even get any thanks or sign of appreciation from the management."

Due to the lack of help on the night shift, some of Steve's responsibilities include cleaning the Campus Center concourse, the Hatch, the Blue Wall and the Cape Cod lounge and setting up for three or four conferences a day.

Ashoke Ganguli, the director of Auxiliary Services, said in a recent Collegian article that there were more than enough janitors and the problem is the way staff is managed.

Joe, a supervisor of the day-shift janitors, said the management's idea to switch two janitors from the day shift to the night shift and compensate the loss with students is unfair to the workers.

He said losing two day staff janitors would cut his staff down to six people. "My men will have to try even harder to get everything done, but I don't see how that is possible because they are already stressed to the point that they can't do anymore work."

Steve said if he got switched to the night shift he might quit. "I worked nights for three years already and I feel I've earned my place on the day shift," he said.

Forrest Davies, director of Building Services, said in a recent Collegian article that the nightshift has decreased over the years from 21 to 13 janitors.

Joe said even though the students are good workers they are not as familiar with the set-up for different conferences and are unreliable when it is exam time or

UM addresses diversity

Increased cultural awareness sought

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Multicultural Advisory Board held a meeting yesterday to discuss ways to increase the University's commitment to fostering a multicultural atmosphere on campus.

Among the goals of the meeting was an attempt to devise better ways to address the growing concerns of students regarding cultural awareness and sensitivity on campus, administrators said.

Vice Chancellor for Equal Opportunity and Affirmative Action Frederick Tillis opened the meeting by asking members to agree on whether the University's mission statement reflects a commitment to promoting and fostering multiculturalism.

"The mission statement expresses well the concept of multiculturalism, and I believe this campus takes a strong stand on serving the needs of the students," said Tillis.

Tillis criticized members of the campus community he thinks have fallen away from a commitment to promoting multiculturalism.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien charged those members present at the meeting to serve as marshalls — advocates to make multiculturalism a true reality on this campus.

There were several members who disagreed with the mission statement. Professor of education Sonia Nieto said she believes unless the University grapples with the issue of affirmative action, "multiculturalism will be seen through a single lens."

"[The mission statement] was too broad and did not state how this was to be accomplished," Nieto said.

The question of including a multicultural curriculum in various academic disciplines was brought up by Nieto, who said she believes this is another area the University as a whole must address if it is to meet the needs were to exchange the memorandum for his list. . ."

"With a huge smile he again reached for the envelope. I smiled in return and while picking up the envelope with both hands (tight grip) asked him if he had the list. . . He went to a cabinet and produced an envelope from which he extracted what was obviously a very short list of names."

"I took the memorandum out of the envelope and passed it to him while he passed the list to me," Guay wrote.

Sung told Guay that the list of 10 was all "they" had given him, according to Guay's cable.

The next day, Guay was ordered to deliver another letter from Nixon calling the Laotian list unsatisfactory and saying it was "inconceivable that only 10 of these men would be held prisoner in Laos."

Sung told Guay the United States must understand the "difficulties involved in finding pilots who were drowned in Laos."

The meetings took place a week after the announcement of the Paris peace accords that set the stage for the U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam.

Among other issues being explored by the committee is whether U.S. refusal to follow through on financial aid may have prompted North Vietnam to hold POWs.

Straight Ticket Voting

Michigan Congressional candidate Dick Chrysler, a Republican businessman, has certainly figured out a way to end voter apathy among college students. The State News, the student newspaper of Michigan State University, reports that Chrysler set up a campaign tent outside the MSU-Central Michigan University football game on Saturday, Sept. 12. Chrysler campaign workers handed out bumper stickers, buttons, campaign literature, hamburgers and free beer.

The State News reports the tent was swarmed with over a hundred students, who, for just promising to "vote for Dick", were presented free food and Molson Golden Beer. Apparently no students were asked for proper age identification before being allowed to drink.

The Chrysler campaign people claim they were carding students who drank but many students state it was not so. No matter how old the people were who were drinking, Chrysler is obviously on to something. Campaign organizer Laura Simoni is quoted as saying, "we really wanted to get the students involved in the issues." One student described the free beer tactic as "pretty good campaigning."

No one seemed to raise the issue that Molson is brewed in Canada and serving it would fly straight in the face of an "America First" campaign slogan.

Nevertheless, with alcohol now being allowed to be consumed before UMass football games, I urge all local candidates to look into the Chrysler technique of campus campaigning.

One step forward, two steps back

The Beta Theta Phi Fraternity at Syracuse University recently took out an open rush ad in The Daily Orange which calls for new pledges to join the fraternity and help wipe out the stereotype of the "fraternity man as a dumb, alcoholic, abusive, sexist pig."

The advertisement goes on to state that this perception of fraternities is undermining the Greek System throughout the country.

However, the advertisement has a quirk. On one side of the ad is a column named "A", on the other side a column named "B". The ad asks the reader to fold the paper, connecting point A with point B and receive the hidden message.

The message states: "Rush Beta, chicks dig us."

The Top 20 — It must be a dream

The narcoleptic nemesis of falling asleep in class has affected every college student, but at the University of Arizona, it is apparently even more common.

The Arizona Daily Wildcat reports on Thursady August 20 that UA was ranked by the Princeton Review Student Access Guide to Best Colleges to be in the top 20 colleges with the most boring lectures.

Wildcat students seem to concur with the ranking. One student remarked "It was a mutual combination of the instructor and statistics that propelled me to deeper and deeper sleep." Another student compared UA lectures to watching C-Span.

According to the Daily Wildcat, the review goes on to mention UA's long-standing reputation as a "party school" and warns that there is a lot of sun, parties, and non-studious students to distract the campus.

UMass did not make the Top 20.

Pizza and then a nap

In the August 21 addition of the Arizona Daily Wildcat is an article about the successful opening of a Domino's Pizza in the Student Union.

In its first day open for lunch, the restaurant served 725 slices to 580 people, according to the manager. Domino's expects business to continue to grow and are currently working out ways to keep lines from growing too long.

Domino's is being closely watched by other fast-food chains and if it remains a success, UA students can expect other restaurants to franchise inside their student union.

There is no mention of the possibility of delivery to some of those boring lectures.

Presidential election increases totals in voter registration drive

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

Increased interest and awareness in the upcoming presidential election has led to almost twice as many students registering to vote in this week's voter registration drive, almost doubling last year's total, according to the drive's organizers.

About 500 students registered yesterday in the first day of the three-day registration drive sponsored by the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group and the Student Government Association. Last year roughly the same number were registered altogether.

Many students say they look forward to their first time at the polls.

"It's my right as a citizen and a chance to take a stand," said Lori Switaj, a sophomore wildlife biology major, who has never voted in the presidential election before. She said she wished more people would become involved and vote.

"If we want to get things done in the country we have to take a stand," said Switaj.

Although the number of students registered last year was topped in only the first day of registration yesterday, there wasn't quite as large a turnout today, according to the campus organizer working at the drive, Sarah Turk.

"Not enough people were out leafletting, but we're excited so far and hope more come tomorrow," said Turk. "It's really important."

Turk estimated about 300-400 students have registered as of 1:30 yesterday afternoon. The drive is aiming to register 2,000 by today, the last day of the drive, which will be held in the Cape Cod lounge of the Student Union until 2 p.m.

By 10 a.m. yesterday, when the drive opened, there was a line out the door of the lounge, according to Laoisi King, a MASSPIRG member who was working the drive.

"Student response has been positive. It's really busy because of the (presidential) election," King said.

For many it is the first time to have a say in the presidential election.

"So few people are deciding the fate of the country," said junior social thought and political economy major JoAnne Bunuan, who said she is voting for Clinton.

"He's the lesser of two evils. I don't like Bush, but I'm pro-Hillary," said Bunuan.

Junior English major Andrew Somers said he is excited about his first opportunity to vote and he knows a lot of other people who are going to cast their ballots. He also said he is going to vote for Clinton.

Several students said they believed registering to vote and voting are part of the duties of being a citizen.

"You've got to do it sometime," said Jake Nevela, a freshman School of Management major, who says he sees it as a chance to get involved.

"My vote is going to count, I'm sure," said Carla McKay, a graduate student in labor studies, who though registered in Washington D.C. as a democrat, is registering here to increase the number of democrats in Massachusetts.

McKay said she is "definitely against Bush," and is not pleased with the manner in which he has handled the labor movement.

"Clinton isn't the best but he's better than Bush," said McKay.

Students reflect on '92 election

Majority unsatisfied with both candidates, Congress

By CAROLINE NASSON
Collegian correspondent

With the 1992 presidential election nearing, many voters feel they are faced with a difficult decision regarding whom they prefer in office and which political party they would like to see in control of Congress.

In an informal Collegian poll, the majority of the twenty University of Massachusetts students polled on Monday expressed general dissatisfaction with the presidential candidates, saying the country needs a break from the status quo.

Because the majority of these voters believe that the current Congress is failing, Democratic candidate Bill Clinton was the preferred candidate.

Students responded to the question "If the Presidential election was today, who would you vote for and why?":

• Adam Scott Roberts, sophomore communications major:

"I'd vote for Clinton because he supports a woman's right to a legal abortion, and because I hate Dan Quayle."

• Adam Silver, senior zoology major:

"Clinton, not because he would do a good job but because he can't be any worse than Bush. Why not give someone else a try?"

• Lori Jones, freshman political science major:

"Clinton, because Bush is not doing anything for the environment."

• Alan Flores, sophomore mechanical engineering major:

"Clinton, because he seems like a down-to-earth person, not an old grandpa who does not know what's going on. He's more in touch with today than yesterday."

• Jane Urry, senior history major:

"I would write in Jerry Brown because Clinton comes across as slime and Bush has not done much for our economy and all of our foreign policy decisions have been totally misguided."

• Jorge Gonzalez, junior forestry major:

"None of the candidates are worth it. It's like deciding between the lesser of two evils."

• Rich Martin, senior English major:

"I would vote for Clinton because, unfortunately, he is the democratic candidate."

• Elana Barnett, sophomore communication disorders major:

"Clinton, because we need a change, and he is more modern than Bush, and he knows what we need in today's society."

• Amy Ford, junior HRTA major:

"Clinton, because I just do not want Bush in there."

• Justin P. Edelman, junior communications major:

"Clinton, because although there is not one great

Recycling program seeks to educate, cut down on waste

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL

Roger Guzowski, a 1992 University of Massachusetts natural resource studies graduate, sorts through the trash. He is not, however, a college graduate out of work. Guzowski is head of the University's Housing Services Recycling program.

"We started sorting a year ago. There were so many contaminated barrels," Guzowski said. "I realized that we were throwing away good paper [in those barrels]."

At the Tilson Farm Power Plant, Guzowski and his staff of six students sift through 1,500 to 4,500 pounds of waste that is gathered from the residential recycling bins. Wearing gloves, students are usually sorting through the bins Tuesdays and Wednesdays. In addition to sorting 25 hours a week, students wash down the recycling bins once a week.

"We have had people from all walks of life. We all want to get involved in the environment," Guzowski said. "A lot of people get involved in the recycling programs through internships or independent studies."

Paper board such as cereal boxes and beer cases are the most frequent contaminates. Because paper board is of so low a quality, there is a little market for it, according to Guzowski. Therefore it is not recycled.

Basement Notes tell tale of boy raised as sculpture

I have a propensity for volunteering for things I haven't the slightest idea how to do, and often come to regret. For example: kindergarten. I wanted to attend, I begged my parents to let me attend, but my mother had doubts.

My mother came from a family of strict morals, and even after she had been married five years her parents still believed that she was a virgin (that her parents bought this says something of the low esteem in which they held my father). Instead of kindergarten, she wanted to cover me with white paint and try to pass me off as a classical Greek statue, on the grounds that a small child might give away her non-maiden status.

Barry
DEUTSCH

My father didn't like this plan; the house was decorated in high modern, and a small Greek statue would clash with the rest of the decor. Furthermore, how long could I be expected to hold the pose? A compromise was reached: they would cover me with stiff enamel paint and give me to my Uncle Morrie, who was nouveau riche and so had lousy taste anyway. But Morrie's sculpture garden had no room, (he had four kids of his own) so my parents were back to square one.

Where, you may wonder, were my paternal grandparents during all this? Actually, they lived with us, but as they spoke only random syllables strung into sentences, none of us knew what they thought (this wasn't as odd as it may at first sound; they had immigrated from a small Jewish village in Russia not far from Helm), in which the village rabbi had announced, after intensive study of Torah and Talmud, that God was totally incomprehensible. The village folk, who believed in emulating God in all things, decided that they would never again be comprehensible in His presence. Since God is everywhere, it followed that they could never again speak anything but gibberish, anywhere. And ever since, none of them have made even the slightest sense, which makes playing Monopoly in their village a bit of a trial.

(It's a curious footnote to this story that, after another decade's intensive study, the same wise rabbi announced that in fact it was top-down economics which were incomprehensible, and that if everyone would stop speaking gibberish and maybe bring him a nice corn beef on rye he'd be much happier. But by that time nobody but the rabbi understood sensible language, so he never got his sandwich and was eventually forced to eat his own Greek Sculptures and died of constipation — tragically, he had no children).

So my paternal grandparents were of no help to me. I began a course of begging my mother to let me go to kindergarten. I pointed out that her parents, having produced her, were not altogether innocent of the birds and the fleas. (Later, I found out I was wrong about this; my maternal grandparents had sex, and my grandmother gave birth, entirely under hypnosis and thus had no idea of where my mother came from. For the first twelve years of my mother's life, she had to endure her parents periodically forgetting who she was, on which occasions they would take my mother around the market square, asking if anyone had misplaced a little boy — my maternal grandparents, as well as being forgetful, weren't very observant. On her 12th birthday, my mother obtained a copy of her birth certificate, which she still carries in her wallet to show her parents in their moments of doubt.)

Just how this relates to kindergarten, and indeed how my kindergarten experiences relate to "Notes From the Campus Center Basement," may seem obscure; but I will explain all in next week's column.

Unjust male bashing pains writer

I am 22-year-old sophomore and a new student at UMass. I lived in the Valley last year and I have seen liberal attitudes similar to those I have experienced while living just outside of Boston. I respect an open mind and an active commitment to change things. But my feelings flare when I, an innocent person, have to read, hear and feel all the male bashing that goes on when hurt women get together.

I am aware of the oppression that rages on against women by a lot of careless and insensitive men. Some women would contend that no man could ever know, and in a sense they are right. I grew up without a dad in a house full of sisters and have seen first hand all forms of abuse. So in another sense I do know some.

To all the hurt and abused women out there: please try to focus your energy in ways that will be most effective to your cause. To sum up either gender will only serve to drive us all further apart. I ask you as an innocent man to be a little more mindful of your actions because I have been wrongfully hurt by overzealous, well-intending females.

The fight against racism needs more than a bullhorn

". . .and UMass has continued to refuse to stop their racist discrimination, and we are sick and tired of taking it! We are going to force them to change if we have to stay all weekend!" shouted a woman into a bullhorn. The large group of people gathered on and around the long conference table gave some enthusiastic applause.

One of the faculty members who was part of the meeting we invaded stood up, looking rather exasperated. He motioned for the wire handset that we used to speak through the bullhorn. The woman handed it to him while continuing to hold the horn. "But what are your goals? What are you trying to change?" he asked heatedly, emphasizing the question with his hands.

Nathan
CRICK

The woman holding the bullhorn and the rest of our main spokespeople looked at him with irritation. "What do mean, 'What are we trying to change?'" demanded the woman. "What do you think?"

"But you have no plan, you need to set down some kind of directive for what you want done!" shouted the green-sweatered faculty member. "You can't just come in here with nothing! What have you got to propose? What are your purposes for being here?"

"And what are the reasons for racism?" retaliated a guy across the table. "How come we need reasons to try to end it?"

An older woman with long matted hair stood up a couple seats away. "It's people like you who make it so hard to get anything done!" she cried. "It's people like you who promote racism with your closed-mindedness!"

"I am not trying to argue with your intentions!" he yelled back. "You just have to have a plan of action! You have to be able to work within the system! You can't get anything done if. . ."

The man ceased to speak as the bullhorn woman yanked the handset away from him. He paused and shook his head. "I am just trying to. . ."

"Okay, who else wants to speak?" the woman asked with a laugh, turning away from the man. She offered the handset up to the next contestant. The green-sweatered man sighed, sat down, and turned up his hands helplessly to the faculty member sitting next to him.

My memory may not be precisely correct in relating the exact dialogue from that Whitmore conference room five months ago, but I distinctly remember when the handset was forcibly removed from the man's hands. It was one of many things that left a rather bad taste in my mouth, that made me embarrassed to be part of something that did not give justice to the grandiose ideals it was trying to promote. Our initial demands were blatantly simplistic, impossible to implement, and violated affirmative action laws anyway. Yet when the man tried to tell us that, we told him to shut up and sit down. Don't rain on our parade.

But crusades are funny things. They breed the kind of people who believe they stand on a moral high ground which allows them to crucify whomever may differ with their views, all in the name of righteousness. Racism is certainly a problem in this country — one need only listen to Pat Buchanan to realize that, but it is not a problem only in one sense.

Especially on this campus, racism had become a catchword used against those who may disagree with anyone who claims to be fighting on the side of racial justice. Racism is used not only to condemn these people, but justifies such things as the censorship of a newspaper, the destruction of property and violence against people who have nothing more than differences of opinion. Violence may produce some nifty speeches, but you only need ask a resident of South Central L.A. to know violence meaninglessly destroys lives and causes more problems than existed beforehand.

But I don't think we really ever accept that fact. The Whitmore protest was a peaceful and, for better or worse, a productive demonstration. But in it I could see the beginning of what was later to manifest itself as a violent crusade in the days to come, a crusade that effectively shut down all rational discussions and glorified the Machiavellian principle of might makes right.

For the crusaders to claim some sort of moral victory for that scares me, because the repression of reason and the rationalization of violence are the main instruments of fascism. Let us just hope that the fight against racism is not used to satiate our desire for a good old-fashioned witch hunt. It deserves more than that.

Nathan Crick is a UMass student.

Article distorted nature of protest

I am writing in response to the Associated Press article [Collegian, Sept. 21] "UM Collegian threatened with civil suit." I feel compelled to write to express my anger and disgust and to give a more accurate version of what took place in April.

At the beginning of this summer I read an article in a Washington, D.C., area paper about the April protest at UMass. Similar to the AP article, it portrayed the protest as violent actions performed by minority students. I wondered for a second why a paper so far away from UMass and so many months after the fact was printing this article. Then I realized that papers all over were scared by this protest, viewing it as a threat to their journalistic freedom. As a result of their fear, they had taken an attack position and went to work vilifying the protest. The main emphasis of the reporting had been the supposed death threats received by Collegian staff members.

I cannot speak to deny or confirm the occurence of death threats, but I can say that if they did take place, they were isolated incidents initiated by individuals outside the spirit of the protest. I was there the entire day that UMass students marched to the police station and the Collegian and occupied Whitmore. I was involved in the week of meetings and demonstrations that followed. All of these methods are non-violent attempts to channel rage into productive results.

The broken window that is continuously referred to in articles "covering" the protest was an accident; students were clapping and chanting and banging on the wall, and a concealed pane of glass located behind a corkboard was broken accidentally. Throughout the day there were constant instructions from the marchers with the megaphone not to touch, break or disturb anything.

The AP article said the protest group consisted of "250 Black, Hispanic, Asian and other students" and then immediately proceeded to talk about violence. The article I read earlier this summer called it a group of minority students, and again proceeded to talk about violence. The racial make-up of the group was mixed, but predominantly white.

These attempts to make the protests of last April look like a bunch of irrational minority students who went on a binge of rioting and destruction and attempted to put harsh journalistic restrictions on the poor Collegian is more than distortion or imagination. It is the exact racist use of journalism, in the guise of protecting freedom of speech that we were strongly, but not violently, protesting. Let's not get on this high horse about journalistic freedom unless the reaction would be the same in a constant state of white-bashing newspapers, and I think we all know that like hell it would be.

Baby Boomers' disdain for younger generation offends

So what were you doing when John F. Kennedy was assassinated? If you are my age, you weren't even born yet. It doesn't take a mathematician to figure out that most of the undergraduates at this University, myself included, couldn't possibly have witnessed this event which left such a lasting impression in the memory of so many Americans. Not to mention the assassinations of other great leaders who died before our lifetimes began, like Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and Robert Kennedy. So why is it that most adults are surprised when I tell them that my only impression of the day President Kennedy was assassinated comes from the bad black and white documentaries on public television and director Oliver Stone's controversial movie version of what happened?

It seems that many Baby Boomers look upon the events which shaped their lives while they were growing up with a sense of insanely reverent nostalgia. The adults that I've spoken with on this subject all gave me the impression that they felt sorry for me because I haven't lived through the eventful times they have. But should we blame them? My parents were my age in the 1960s. No one can deny that these were truly historical times in America and probably a very exciting time to live in.

But the pity that some of the Baby Booners may feel for us is undeserved and unwelcome. It is based on the assumption that the Sixties was a time in which many great events took place, which is true, and that these were events which have yet to be equalled, which is false. The decade in which Baby Boomers came of age, while definitely historically groundbreaking, was not the end of America's great political history of social change through political activism. And contrary to what many of them believe, they will not be the last generation to make a difference in this country by making their voices heard. Not if I have a say in the issue.

James J.
BROWN

There seems to be an unspoken consensus among those of my parents' generation that the Sixties were significant while the Seventies were just plain boring. At least on a personal level, I cannot agree with this. Something important did happen in the Seventies — I was born, along with millions of other frustrated youth. For someone to tell me that nothing eventful has happened in this country since the Sixties is the same as telling me that my entire generation has been a waste of time, that I've been leading a 22-year existence in the shadow of an era which will probably not be rivaled in my lifetime.

Sometimes, even though I don't want to, I believe them. I've grown up in a society that never seems to listen to what young people say or even take what they have to say seriously. I'd like to blame the problems of our nation today, the apathy and hopelessness among young people especially, on the adults who are in power now. They've given us bad role models and dumped more environmental, economic and even health problems on us than we ever can remedy in the near future. I'd like to blame those who were alive in this country during a time when it seemed that you really could make a difference by speaking out for what you believe in. But when I try to blame the adults, I realize that I can't, because I'm an adult too, albeit a young one, and now is the time to start taking responsibility for the state of our nation and do something about it, not assign blame for it.

For me and those my age, our entire life has been spent watching ineffective presidents shape events which we have no say in, a great deal of them without our interests in mind and not taking our opinions of how things should be done into account. We can't fall into the trap our elders have of believing that nothing eventful has happened since the Sixties. In 1971, the 26th and as of yet final amendment was added to the Constitution. This amendment granted the nation's 11 million 18 to 21-year-old Americans of the time the right to vote.

Now it's time for us to prove what a powerful political voice we have. Now we finally have the chance to make our difference by registering to vote and casting our ballot in the next election. Or, if you've already registered, you can encourage a friend to do the same. Trust me: it's easy and it's effective.

It's hard for young adults in America today not to be discouraged by all the problems we've inherited from the generation before us. But they did hand at least one good thing to us over 21 years ago: the ability to right the wrongs they have left us with and, most of all, to make sure our voice is heard. Believe me, we have the power to do it. Make your mark, rock the vote. By the way, no matter how much I've said against Baby Boomers, I don't hold too much against them. After all, I am going to vote for one in November.

Man insulted by column on rape

Hello, UMass. I am a white, male, heterosexual fraternity brother. After 4.5 years here at UMass, some people would think that I should be ashamed of this fact. Well, guess what: I'm NOT. I am proud of who I am.

Since I started attending UMass, all I read and hear about is how white, male, heterosexual fraternity men are the evil creatures of the world. We oppressed minorities, bashed homosexuals and now I have raped women. I didn't think I could accomplish all this just by attending UMass. But according to Multicultural Affairs columnist Alexander Nguyen [Collegian, Sept. 23], I have "forced women into sex." Hey, I have news for you, pal. I respect women like the majority of male heterosexuals and I am insulted that you can make this assumption that I have forced women to have sex. You, my friend, have problems.

Please do not get me wrong — I know rape occurs and it is a problem that must be addressed. But how dare you tell the world that all men have "forced women to have sex." This is not journalism, it is TRASH, plain and simple. I still cannot understand how this article, that takes up a full page of the paper that should represent us, could be there. How is bashing men multicultural? I do not always agree with everything in the Collegian — everyone has their opinion and I may not agree with them — but I will not sit here and read this trash about how I rape women. It is totally untrue and I expect an apology from Mr. Nguyen, immediately.

As for the rest of the UMass world, please stop trying to educate me on how I should be. Every semester there is a new group on campus saying that males are bad and we do terrible things. Some of these people are upset about the generalizations made about them (i.e., homosexuals, minorities and women). Well, I am upset with generalizations made about me and my friends. I am not some disgusting person who wants to rape women, oppress the minorities and rid this country of homosexuals. Please stop portraying me and my friends as beasts. We are not. We just want to live our lives, be happy and make the small world around us a better place for all men and women to live.

Columnist distorts evangelist's points of view

The editorial policy of the Collegian moves me to reply to David Rivera's piece [Collegian, Sept. 22]. Editorial policy seems to be: throw out interesting writers; keep numbskulls. He expresses the opinion that Cliffe Knechtle is some kind of con artist. I found this "act" refreshingly different from the conventional evangelism.

While I am not born-again and doubtful about the relevance of fundamentalism to, for example, healing racism in our country, I feel my open-mindedness left me less threatened by his debate and argument. Some of those disagreeing with the preacher affected physically confrontational poses the student Mr. Knechtle was depicted as in earnest debate with showed little courtesy, and his argument was entirely flippant except for the quote Mr. Rivera uses.

What I saw was a kind of mental gymnastics, Knechtle trying to provoke intelligent reasoning from any comers, and it might have been more interesting if the skepticism of the audience had formed into anything non-repetitive or non-circular.

While the abortion rights issue has very high stakes, Rivera and many in the audience inadvertently missed the point of the Nazi Germany comparison Knechtle used. To treat the civil disobedience of protesters concerned with any issues differently because of the particular issue is attuned with the Nazis' suppression of all dissent. It is not any moral high ground to embrace totalitarian measures to silence protest around issues deemed valuable enough to have at any cost; it is merely warfare.

Knechtle tried to shame students more, it appeared to me, with accusations of "intellectual dishonesty" than "atheism." Can the Collegian claim to be intellectually honest?

Glenn S. Foster

Collegian misrepresented Knechtle's words

I considered writing a letter last week after the article about Cliffe Knechtle [Collegian, Sept. 17]. It was an extremely biased rendition of what was going on outside the Student Union. When I read David Rivera's column, [Collegian, Sept. 22] I could not remain quiet.

I was present for a large portion of Knechtle's presentations, and neither writer has painted a clear picture of the evangelist's visit to UMass.

The reporter spends a large portion of the article worrying about what the crowd had to say about Knechtle's statements, but never really explains what those statements were or what his point was.

Rivera criticized religion, which is ironic because Knechtle criticized religion also. He urged listeners not to follow religion, but to personally investigate the reality of Jesus Christ and to follow him. Knechtle urged people not to believe himself or what he was saying, but to read the Bible (especially the four gospels) and to decide for themselves whether or not Jesus is worth following.

If Knechtle had been here to "line his bank account," as Rivera alleges, why did he wear the same clothes all three days he was here? Mr. Rivera, if Knetchle were making a pile of money from speaking at UMass, don't you think he'd have a large flashy wardrobe? Besides, from whom is he making all of this money you accuse him of making? I am a member of Intervarsity Christian Fellowship, the RSO which paid for Knechtle's visit to UMass, and the money we raised was to feed his family, not make him wealthy. We both have heard of hypocritical "phony" preachers (like Jim Baker) who rip people off for selfish reasons. Knechtle renounced their actions many times each of the three days he spoke.

One of Knechtle's main points was that people have used the church to do a lot of evil throughout history, but that is a tragedy. If you only look at those things, you fail to see a God who is outraged by them, as you and I are.

Thursday, not Friday, was Knechtle's last day. And the incident Rivera relates about comparing abortion clinics to concentration camps was to convey the value of human life, regardless of stage in development. We all are survivors of abortion, as the student's grandparents are survivors of Nazism. I personally am glad to be here today and grateful my mother did not have an abortion, even though doing so would have made her life much easier.

Mr. Rivera, I will agree with you that religions and churches have a lot of problems and certainly plenty of hypocrisy. But you have gone too far by saying they are "inherently evil." You have offended a large number of people on campus, who, contrary to what you would like to think, believe in a real God.

Rivera's hostility hurts his judgment

I hope most UMass students have the one brain cell required to see through David Rivera's bigoted and judgmental column [Collegian, Sept. 22]. Not only is it riddled with inaccuracies, but irrational hostility seems to have clouded his judgment.

Mr. Rivera claims to remember the quote Cliffe Knechtle denied (that humans asked God for free will, a self-contradicting statement), but also claims to have seen Knechtle talk on Friday, when Knechtle only spoke from Tuesday through Thursday. Some memory. I wonder what other imaginary discussions he's had. He lumps Knechtle in with "superstar" preacher debacles, specifically Jim Bakker. That would be like saying that local actors conduct themselves like the "stars" of the Hollywood crew, or that local musicians lead lifestyles comparable to Madonna and Prince. This is very shallow thinking. He shows a great ignorance of history in his understanding of the Crusades and the Inquisition, both of which were manipulated and controlled more by the state than the church at that time, which any casual student of history could see was full with corruption of every sort at that point in history.

He also talks about "false hope," "hypocrisy," etc. Cliffe Knechtle would be the first to point out that yes, religion has been used by people throughout history as a tool to manipulate and impoverish people. But, in contrast with false hope and lack of integrity, there is real hope in Jesus Christ, Y'Shua, and real integrity may be found there. I am ashamed at many things people, "Christians" or not, have done, but I have never been ashamed pf anything Jesus has done. The fact that humans continue to mess up does not mean that there is no hope, but serves to point out how much we need a solution to our dilemma, a solution found in restoring our relationship with our Creator.

Before Mr. Rivera "blathers" on with all the credibility of the Collegian (well-known for accuracy, NOT), he should check his facts. It also shows a real lack of courage to stab Cliffe Knechtle in the back after he's left the campus, rather than confront him personally.

modations to stay with friends until they can be house.

The problem this semester with student housing is "due to many reasons," said Joseph Zannini, executive director of Housing Services. Many students never filled out housing preference cards, according to Zannini, and many never called housing services to inform them that their semester bill was paid late.

"Those [problems] happen every year. The difference this year is because of the decreasing enrollment in the past years, we decided to close down two Southwest towers this year," Zannini said.

Last year, there were only 3,200 incoming freshman. This year, the total of incoming freshman increased to 3,900. Zannini said the University closed the towers for renovation because construction costs and enrollment were down.

It wasn't until late this summer that Housing realized they had an increase of not only incoming students, but also an eight percent increase in upperclassmen living on campus, said Zannini. This left Housing with the difficult task of finding rooms for this unexpected surplus of students.

Brian Falla, a junior undecided major, called Housing this summer and was assured his room would be held even though his bill was going to be late. He went to sign into his room during the first week of school and found he didn't have a room. Housing also gave him a swing room and no answers.

"They didn't know why my room was canceled or when I would move out of temporary housing. For all I know, I could be in swing space all my life," Falla said.

Approximately 114 students were placed in swing space this semester. According to housing officials, they should all receive room assignments within the next week.

Zannini said housing has two goals: to accommodate students and to use the facilities in the best way possible.

A female student at the University said that she began waiting in line at Whitmore at 5 a.m. during the first week.

But Housing assigned her to a residence hall in which all the rooms were filled. She had to wait three days to finally receive a housing assignment. A week had gone by without her having a room.

"I don't think it's fair," she said. "I pay for a full semester of housing. The way I see it, they owe me one week's rent."

To solve these housing woes, the University has re-opened JFK tower in Southwest for the fall semester. Housing officials say they'll try to empty all the swing space first and accommodate students who still need rooms. everyone's needs as best as they can.

room," said sophomore legal studies major Stephanie Easenberg. "Housing has repeatedly told us that it is our privilege and not our right to have housing, but it is definitely the other way around."

"How could UMass be so unprepared as to not know the number of people expected?" asked Lisa Bonsall, a senior journalism major on national exchange. "I don't expect special treatment for being an echange student, but I at least expect a decent place to live."

"It will be hard to encourage others to come here with such a bad start," Bonsall said.

Junior marketing major Dan De France, also on exchange, said, "When I first got here it was obvious JFK had a much lower budget compared to other dorms because everything seemed filthy. It isn't fair because we're all paying the same amount for rooms.

Other students say they agree and feel they deserve some form of fiscal compensation. According to Carnahan, the housing authorities are undecided about doing so, but they are trying to put together a proposal to satisfy everyone.

With a capacity of 570, JFK now houses approximately 550 students. Although the number is slowly declining due to students relocating, Carnahan encourages the residents to settle in.

"The [resident assistants] are trying to make it a better environment by doing programs with the floor to create a community," said Jennifer Sabbagh, a junior communications major and resident assistant.

Although renovations won't be done this semester, paint is made available free of charge for students who desire to paint their walls. "We're trying to make this a residence hall where people want to live and be content for the semester," Carnahan said.

A semester is as long as the residents have to be happy, because JFK will be closed in the spring.

■ janitor

they have homework to do.

"The students don't know how to do our work and they don't have pride in their work like the regular janitors do," said Steve.

Joe said the Campus Center is going become messy due to the lack of help. He said his workers won't have time to clean the windows and unfrequented public areas.

"Today the Blue Wall opened at 8 a.m., but the janitors didn't get in to clean it until 8:30 a.m," Joe said.

Joe, who has been a janitor for 20 years, said he doesn't have any proof that the rumor that janitors were calling in sick to protest being overworked was true. "I know my janitors keep secrets from me and this is something they would never tell me."

Steve said if the sick-outs were meant as a form of protest then all the janitors on all the shifts would have called in sick. "The workers who called in sick were probably just burnt out from putting in so much overtime."

Joe said the management has asked the day shift workers to come in as early as 4 a.m. and work until 3 p.m. "When the janitors do this two or three times in a row they end up running out of energy and their performance on the job goes down."

"Management is not taking into consideration the janitors' feelings and suggestions about what to do with the problem of understaffing," said Joe.

He said the two people who are going to be bumped from day to night shift will receive their notices this Friday. "They are going to be terribly upset."

■ recycling

"I think the biggest problem we see about contamination is that a lot of people get confused [with what they can recycle]," Guzowski said. "We are trying to get people to recycle. Landfills are closing up and the threat is very real.

"No one wants a new landfill in their backyard. It is easy to mandate recycling in the office," Guzowski said. "It is a lot harder to walk into people's homes, asking them to recycle. There are still a lot of people who don't know the problem or don't care."

Students must not only recycle, but they should also buy recycled goods in order to close the gap. Guzowski cautions buyers that a lot of what is marketed as "recycled" is actually not.

"A lot of what is listed as recycled is made of mail scraps. They have been doing this for years," Guzowski said. "If it is not listed as post-consumer waste, than it is not [made] of what you are recycling. People want to do good, but they are being taken for a ride."

The Housing Services Recycling program was born out a merger of University Recyclers, a student organization, and the University's need to recycle under Amherst law. Amherst fines the University for any trash containing more than 5 percent recycled material sent to the town's landfill.

"Our program is not cost-effective. It is less expensive to just throw away [all the materials in the contaminated barrels]," Guzowski said. "But that discourages those who are recycling."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Get an early start today; morning will be your most productive time. Consider the costs involved before agreeing to a vacation plan. You will have more fun if you stay out of debt.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Beware of people who promise you the moon. Get financial details in writing. Your children deserve more of your time. An innovative approach is a winner in business.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Avoid the superficial and sick to the traditional today. You are much too smart to be taken in by hype. Reread a favorite book or see a wonderful old movie this evening.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Reworking an old idea will produce much better results than you obtained before. Be careful to mail a document to the correct address or you could miss an important deadline.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Be honest if you are unhappy about certain aspects of a relationship. Bringing your feelings out in the open leads to new understanding. Check a computer billing; you could find an error.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Your rapport with someone has you walking on air. The days of worry and fear are over. Take nothing for granted where child care arrangements are concerned.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): A close relative or friend needs your assistance today. People you hope to win over are willing to listen now. Put more emphasis on physical fitness.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Putting down roots will help you reach a long-sought personal goal. Re-evaluate a secret romance. Would you be better off on your own? Search your heart for the answers.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Be prepared for loads or reaction, good and bad, when you announce what you have decided to do. If worried, wait until the weekend to let the cat out of the bag.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Traveling keeps you on the run, but it should also put more cash in your pocket. It is best to keep silent about a change you are considering. Build up your savings.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Put family before friends if push comes to shove today. A telephone call could lead to an unexpected opportunity for you or your child. Weigh all factors when negotiating business deals.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Do your homework before moving ahead with a new project. Some facts and figures may be missing. Refuse to let jealousy drive a wedge between you and someone important to your happiness.

of students and teach cultural sensitivity.

Undergraduate student representative Evelyn de Jesus said she believes a comprehensive Puerto Rican History course should be taught at the University.

"There are many Puerto Ricans who attend this University and are not given the same opportunity for a culturally enriching classroom environment," de Jesus said.

Math professor Donald St. Mary said he believes that without the recruitment of minority faculty, the University falls short of meeting the needs of students pursuing degrees in the sciences.

"The presence of minority faculty in the sciences will help encourage students of different nationalities and backgrounds to seek a degree in the sciences," St. Mary said.

Professor Ponce de Leon said he agrees with St. Mary and also said minority students in the sciences need positive role models.

"The community at large needs to visualize proper role models in the sciences that can teach and encourage minority students," de Leon said.

Undergraduate student representative Karen Duffy said the University needs to hire more minority faculty.

"We must provide a cultural incentive to students pursuing a degree in the sciences" said Duffy.

O'Brien recently submitted a letter to Provost Glen Gordon stating the University was headed into an unusual situation.

"The absence of minority faculty creates unwanted anxieties among undergraduate and graduates alike," said O'Brien.

O'Brien also recommended that his successor continue a commitment to this issue and that a study should be conducted on students who have taken the diversity courses. The study will then be examined to see if it has achieved its proposed goals.

O'Brien also distributed copies of a proposed multicultural programs budget which he asked members to look over and submit ideas, suggestions and recommendations prior to the next meeting.

in this one.

• The best sports story on the UMass campus? Sam Koch's men's soccer team. In their "terminal" season, last year the Minutemen were the A-10 surprise and now after perserverance and a large donation the boys are showing why no sport should ever be cut.

• If Clinton and Bush can't agree on a debate, why not throw 'em in the steel cage and let them duke it out. Special guest referee will be H. Ross Perot (this guy is going to be like Billy Martin, always coming back).

• Mullins Arena is really looking nice, but as a purist you've got to love The Cage.

• Keep your feet in bounds and do whatever it. . .

N.E. Patriot Brown's nightmare

By HOWARD ULMAN
Associated Press

FOXBORO — Vincent Brown lay on the ground, wondering if he'd ever walk again. His limbs were lifeless. His thoughts turned to his 2-year-old son.

Brown had just rammed his head into James Jones' side. He knocked the Seattle receiver down and nearly knocked himself out.

The 245-pound linebakcer led the New England Patriots in tackles last year. He's just 27 years old. He has a chiseled physique. But he couldn't move so much as a finger.

"I was thinking that I might not be able to do things with my life that I wanted to, like run around a play with my kids," Brown said Wednesday.

He has one son, Vincent. His wife Robin is expecting their second child.

After six or seven minutes, feeling flowed back into his arms and legs. His fears disappeared. Now Brown, who hurt his neck last Sunday, is thinking about playing this Sunday.

"I would like to" play against Buffalo, he said, "but we're going to treat the symptoms day to day."

Brown still has mild burning sensations in his arms and shoulders. His neck doesn't hurt, although it is sore. He said he's been assured by doctors that he is at no greater risk than he was before the injury, that he just suffered "a slight shock to my spine."

But the moment the incident occurred, the muscular Brown was scared.

"It was very frightening for me. I said I wanted to play this game and give it my all, but I want to be able to walk away from it," he said.

By far the most important development at Sunday's Patriot's game was the unveiling of the new team motto. This space adopts the same creed and together we'll do "Whatever It Takes."

• The Pats have yet to discover "Whatever It Takes," but for me and my esteemed colleagues to return to Foxboro again it's going to take gas money, complimentary tickets, two frosty kegs of Orthwein's finest and a shot at the wide receiver slot.

• Coach Jim Rudy's girls get off to an undefeated start in convincing style and still the Gatorade poll drops them a spot to tenth. I don't want to be like Mike anymore.

David
SCOTT

• It looked like Mike Hodges had the weight of Boyden taken off his shoulders after the Minutemen's win over Holy Cross. It wasn't pretty but it certainly did the trick.

• In a lot of ways the new taligating policy reflects what is wrong with the University as a whole. Tailgating and football are as natural as a slice after the bars, but to ban frisbees and ball playing is ludicrous.

Individual safety is one thing, tossing the pigskin is another. Spatulas can be a dangerous weapon, but is it illegal to flip a burger? What about the skewers for shiskebab? Stay clear of the ketchup bottle, someone could lose an eye. Tailgating, YES. Daycare, NO.

• Perhaps the best kept secret in the Valley is the remarkable pool players who call the Montague Inn home. On any given night there are men and women wielding cues with the authority of Mosconi.

As a rookie in the farm system I am just happy they let me in the door, but with the Pool Professor and barkeep Tina as my coach, I'll be hitting the circuit in no time.

• You had to enjoy the footage of Rob Dibble and Lou Pinella brawling in the Reds locker room and the best part was when someone asked the camera man if he was taping. "No, no I'm not taping." Whatever it takes.

• If you see women's soccer guru Dancin' Dan Wetzel strolling around today give him a few (21) birthday kicks.

• Don Mattingly chases a foul ball that goes a few rows back, finds a youngster with some popcorn and grabs a handful. We need more of that in baseball.

• It looks like Wayne Gretzky might be on the same path as Larry Bird with his aching back. To lose the Great One and The Legend in the same year would be a major blow.

• Stanley Roberts is the classic example of being a big man at the right time. With a lack of men his size in the NBA (or the NFL) teams were willing to gamble on his unproven worth. The Knicks came out of the three-way deal looking good, but isn't Doc Rivers about 82?

• A scandal in the Little League World Series? Next thing you know teammates will be fighting over individual stats. The Phillipine team was stripped of its title and the crown went to the Long Beach, Calif. team. Sounds like Vince McMahon and the World Wrestling Federation had their hands

Hackathorn's two lead soccer

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

It was sweet revenge for the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team yesterday, as it disposed of the Harvard Crimson, the same team which upset them last season.

The Minutewomen (6-0) received a two goal performance from Polly Hackathorn and some stellar defensive play to post the 2-0 victory.

"We definitely played harder because of what happened last season," UMass defenseman Holly Hellmuth said. "It was our pregame inspiration."

Massachusetts, ranked No. 10 in the country, made the Crimson (2-2) pay for last year's 1-0 upset, by dominating nearly ever facet of the game, from start to finish. The Minutewomen defense was tremendous, shutting down the Harvard attack before it could start.

"We played a nice game defensively," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "We came out with a lot of defensive intensity and we were able to pressure any ball they tried to play."

Harvard spent the first half almost entirely pent up in their own end, unable to put more than two passes together to clear the ball.

"We would show them the passing lane and then close it up with a couple of players," Rudy said. "It is real hard work to do that but we worked real hard today."

The hard work did not pay off into goals until the second half, where Hackathorn busted out for two.

In the 51st minute Hellmuth gained possession of the ball 35 yards out on the right flank. She served the ball to the goal mouth where it was deflected up by Nicole Roberts and then headed past Harvard keeper Brooke Donahoe by Hackathorn.

"It was a perfect chip from Holly and that made the play easy for me," said Hackathorn, a sophomore from Palos Verdes, Calif. "I just had to stay with the play."

12 minutes later UMass' Paula Wilkins made a run down the middle of the field. At the top of the goal box she sent the ball through the defense to Hackathorn who was driving in on the left flank. In alone with Donahoe, Hackathorn placed her shot on net and it cleared through the keeper's legs.

MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team defeated Harvard 2-0, Wednesday at Garber Field.

"I was a little wider than I wanted to be and she had the net blocked so I just put it on," Hackathorn said. "It ended up through her legs which surprised me a little. It was a perfect through ball by Paula that caused that goal.

The scores were Hackathorn's second and third tallies of the year.

"It was about time I got a couple of goals," Hackathorn said. "I did not do anything different today, I was just lucky enough to receive two great balls from my teammates."

Skye Eddy played net for the Minutewomen and made seven saves en route to her second shutout of the year. Her goals against average now stands at 0.66.

Berkowitz twirls to success in NE

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

As she walked on to the gymnasium floor at the Miss Majorette Competition last spring in West Springfield, UMass junior Lisa Berkowitz knew that she had to put on her best peformance as well as her best smile to capture the elusive title of "Miss Majorette of the Northeast."

She managed to do both.

"I went on to the floor and just wanted to have a good performance and make the judges smile," she said. "My mother and I were speechless at first when we found out I won and my sister was just jumping around; finally I broke down and cried when I realized that all my hard work had finally paid off."

When all the smoke cleared and the spectators had filed out of the gym, Berkowitz sat alone as the reigning Collegiate Miss Majorette of the Northeast, Collegiate Solo Champion and the New England Regional Queen (first in modeling, interview, poise). A twirling contest consists of 40 percent strut (combination ballet/marching), 40 percent solo twirling and 20 percent modeling so her overall victory in W. Springfield is quite impressive.

Berkowitz, an SOM major and an aspiring accountant from Bedford, MA, first picked up a baton when she was seven years old, and has been twirling competitively (in contests) for four and a half years. She says that over the years, she has learned how to relax more when she competes and just do the best she can.

"What's made me a better twirler is that I don't think of winning or losing when I'm out there but more how my performance is going," she said. "First and foremost, I have to be satisfied with myself and my performance — the day I won Miss Majorette, I just went in hoping that my long hours of practicing would pay off — thankfully they did."

Although twirling is a big commitment, Berkowitz says she loves the sport and will continue competing as long as she enjoys it.

"[Twirling] has given me a lot of poise and confidence that has carried over to everyday life," she said. "I've also met so many people who have become great friends. . . friends that I'll keep for the rest of my life."

Friedberg brings new "Sports Game" to University

Former UMass student Eric Friedberg's entreprenurial venture, "The Sports Game" begins on Oct. 17. Cash and Prizes totaling $100,000 will be awarded.

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

What do you do when you're 24 years old, with a college degree and almost $100,000 in the bank?

If you're Eric Friedberg, you risk it all.

For Friedberg, that risk came in the form of "The Sports Game," a legalized sports betting venture the 24-year-old Framingham native recently sank almost $100,000 into.

Essentially legalized gambling, "The Sports Game" allows participants the chance to pit their football knowledge against one another, using fictional Sports Game Dollars (SGD).

For a one-time fee of $49.95, each participant is given a "Sports Game" playbook, and $500,000 SGD's to wager on the Sunday NFL games.

Each participant must wager on all of that Sunday's NFL games, with the maximum wager per game being 20,000 SGD's and the minimum being 1,000 SGD's.

Wagering is done on a weekly basis, starting with week six of the NFL season and running through the end of the season.

All betting is done through a toll-free phone number, Wednesday through Saturday, with the top two weekly winners receiving a trip for two to Las Vegas to stay in the Golden Nugget Hotel and Casino. In addition, the top 75 weekly winners will receive NFL hats provided by Starter sportswear.

As an added incentive to UMass students, Friedberg has pledged that if over 100 UMass students participate, the top two UMass season winners will receive NFL jackets courtesy of Starter sportswear.

Weekly winners are determined solely by the Highest SGD amount, with ties being broken based on wins and losses and random drawing. Betting is based solely on wins and losses, and has nothing to do with point spreads, over/unders or any other betting line.

At the end of "The Sports Game" season (Dec. 28), the top ten participants with the largest SGD balance will receive cash prizes, ranging from $10,000 for first place to $1,000 for tenth place.

The initial idea for "The Sports Game" came to Friedberg in 1988, while he was a junior here at the University.

"I was in one of my classes, and we were playing this game called the 'Wall Street Challenge,'" Friedberg said. "Basically what we were doing was playing the stock market with play money. I figured if it could work with the stock market, why not professional football?"

Now that the idea was born, it was up to Friedberg to make his dream a reality.

After graduating from UMass with a degree in Sports Management in 1990, Friedberg went to work on bringing "The Sports Game" to life, working with reckless abandon to get it off the ground.

For Friedberg, this meant selling his seven-year-old highly successful landscaping business, liquidating most of his assets while pumping over $95,000 into his dream.

After months of seemingly endless work involving business plans, business proposals and innumerable rejections, Friedberg's dream finally became a reality on July 1, when he landed The Golden Nugget Hotel and Casino and Starter sportswear as his principle sponsors.

The next three months involved 18-hour work days, weeks of relentless traveling and promotion. Finally in early August Friedberg's four-year-long dream had come to life, when his "The Sports Game" brochure hit the streets.

Friedberg expects between 1000 and 1500 participants in "The Sports Game's" inaugural campaign, and hopes to someday expand to pro basketball as well.

FLOR DE CAÑA

By ERIC T. NELSON
Collegian Correspondent

The music of Flor De Caña transports you to a sunny afternoon on a beautiful Carribean island. You are sitting under the swaying palm trees listening to the hot rhythms of a dynamic seven piece Latin American band. Unfortunately, there will not be a waiter dressed in sharp white linen handing you a Piña Colada from a bamboo tray at Pearl Street on Saturday, but this will be the next best thing.

Flor De Caña's bright and vibrant music is a vacation for the mind. Sit back and listen to their bouncing vocal harmonies and see how long it takes you for your head to start bobbing. Add this to a conga player whose hands don't seem to stop and an outstanding saxophonist weaving his melodies skillfully in between all of this. And what do you come up with? The bundle of joy that is Flor De Caña.

Not only does the group's music invoke beautiful images, but their name, which means "Sugar Cane Flower" in Spanish, also suggests something delightful. Flor De Cana has been playing together for over eight years and is based in Boston.

Flor De Caña are composed of four men and three women, all with an amazing array of musical talent. They are skilled in the use of not only such conventional instruments as guitars, pianos, drums, Bass and saxophone, but also the exotic Latin American varieties of these instruments. The band uses both bongo and conga drums to give their music a spicy, pulsating and a wide range of stringed instruments, such as a charango from the Andes Mountains and the Venezuelan and Puerto Rican cuatro. They also use the zampoñas, or Andean panpipes, which adds a soft and sensuous feel to their music.

The group's rhythmic roots come from such places as Puerto Rico, Uruguay, Bolivia, Argentina and even the United States. Their musical inspiration comes from a movement which joins Latin American musical traditions and contemporary social realities called the Nueva Cancion, or "New Song." It is a very happy and positive musical style, its strong point being its diversity. Their wide range of musical influence and choice of instruments leads to music ranging from a Dominican merengue, a Uruguayan candombe, an Andean huayno, and a Puerto Rican bomba all the way to a West Indian zouk and back to a Venezuelan vals; all of which are guaranteed to get you on your feet and dancing in a conga line in no time.

Flor De Caña have played with such world music luminaries as Ruben Blades and Tito Puente along with folk legends such as Pete Seeger and John McCutcheon. The Boston Music Awards bestowed them with the honor of "Outstanding Latin Act" in 1990.

The group's first full length recording, MUEVETE/MOVE IT! received much critical praise. It's bright and moving music was described as having "a very original sound, incorporating touches of flamenco, cumbia and jazz that are not only sensitive but successful" by the publication Folk Roots from London. Their newest recording, also on Flying Fish Records, BAILANDO EN LA MURALLA/DANCING ON THE WALL was released in September 1991. By March 21, 1992, that album had reached #9 in the world music category in Billboard Magazine.

Flor De Caña will be appearing at Pearl Street in Northampton on Saturday, September 26 at 7:00 pm. Tickets are $10 in advance, $12 at the door.

Kafka and entymology were never so much fun

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Metamorfollies, an original musical comedy by University of Massachusetts student David Wasserman will be holding its first organizational meeting tonight at 7 p.m. in the Union Video Center.

Metamorfollies is loosely based on Franz Kafka's The Metamorphosis, in which the main character Gregor Samsa awakes one morning to find that he has been transformed into a giant insect.

"It was the next logical step," says Wasserman. The project is slated to be performed in the Spring. Until then, Wasserman is gathering people together to work on this massive production. He is looking for everyone from composers to set designers to the cast. Anyone who's interested is invited to this meeting, no matter what the person's qualifications are in theater.

"I want to bring together a hodge podge of people. I'm really excited to have people working together, creating a new and radically different piece of theater," says Wasserman.

Wasserman's background in production is mostly centered around working with film.

"I really want to see more Five College students doing more original work. Do it right. Do it big. Do it with audacity is my philosophy," says Wasserman.

Tonight's meeting will be held in the Union Video Center which is located in the basement of the Student Union, right behind the Hatch.

Julia Hatfield shows the rocker inside of her

By TONY WESTCOTT
Collegian Staff

It's something that must happen to every professional performer at one point - a technical problem forces them to stop a show mid-song - and the way the performer plays it off is crucial to how the audience will respond to the performer and their show from that point on.

In Juliana Hatfield's case, when her bass player's amp cut out a verse into "Lost And Saved," the third song of the evening and the band ceased playing, her first concern was to explain the problem to the audience herself. "No bass!" she giggled and in a few seconds, all was corrected and they were ready to start again.

But instead of going back to the beginning, she decided to resume the song from the point where they'd stopped. "Let's take it from 'Just when I think I'm dead'," she instructed her bandmates, followed by laughs from a few of us in the audience at the irony of starting at that line. At the count of four, we were all revelling in the tune's infectious chorus once again. "Lost And Saved" indeed, but we really couldn't have gone wrong with Juliana Hatfield at the helm.

Backed up by a bassist and drummer, dubbed the Girl Toys, Hatfield, formerly of Boston's Blake Babies, chose Tuesday night to show us the rocker she can be. She jammed on a guitar all night, playing longer and more impressive solos than she does on record, focused on upbeat numbers from her solo album, "Hey Babe," proclaimed twice in several songs how the power of rock moves her soul, and, by the end of the show, her hair, face and shirt were soaked from the exertion of the performance's thirteen songs. Yours would be too if you had to sing Juliana Hatfield's songs the way she does.

Amazingly, her voice never sounded strained as it jumped across three octaves, even as the audience witnessed her neck muscles tighten, her face turn red and her T-shirt change to a darker shade of green. But that's all secondary. Most of the time, you couldn't help but be as enraptured by her songs as she was.

Hatfield abandoned all her Blake Babies material to concentrate on some great tracks off "Hey Babe," including the hooky "Everybody Loves Me But You" and "Forever Baby." Catchy as those songs are, however, she nailed every hard rock number she played, from "Get Off Your Knees" and the new "Rider" to the set closer, arguably her most intense song, "Nirvana."

Still, you can't pin Hatfield down. She premiered a witty tune called "My Sister" and followed it with the aching "Ugly," with not a word between songs. Actually, save for the obligatory thanks after a number or introducing a new tune (she played, altogether, four new songs), Hatfield didn't speak to the audience in conversation, but rather through her songs. Except, of course, during the priceless break in "Lost And Saved." I'm kind of glad we got a chance to realize that the artist behind these wonderful songs is just as magnanimous, intelligent and witty as we all knew she would be.

"You know, it's so ridiculous. If I don't call my parents every Sunday at exactly 5 o'clock, they think I was kidnapped by aliens, or something. Anyway, one Sunday me and Mark, we decide to take-off and check out the city. So we're hanging out and I look at my watch. 5 o'clock. Alright, so my calling card and I head down to the local pool hall. (Which I happen to know has a payphone) And I tell the folks the Martians send their best."

No matter where you happen to be, the AT&T Calling Card can take you home.

It's also the least expensive way to call state-to-state on AT&T, when you can't dial direct. With the new AT&T Call and Save Plan, you'll get special discounts on AT&T Calling Card calls.* And once you have your card, you'll never need to apply for another.

If you get your Calling Card now, your first call will be free. And you'll become a member of AT&T Student Saver Plus, a program of products and services that saves students time and money. All of which makes the AT&T Calling Card out of this world.

Sugar's third release is a refreshing change

By ERIC POULIN
Collegian Staff

Copper Blue
Sugar
Ryko

There's an old theory in the world of music that states that a band or performer's third album usually will be the finest work that they will ever produce. This seems to make a certain degree of sense: a first album is usually the result of many years of hard work and is probably a collection of the band's ten finest songs to date.

Second albums are almost always somewhat awkward, primarily caused by the inevitable rush to re-enter the studio. This occurs in an effort to thrive off of the initial album's success while forgetting about the very elements that made the debut what it was. After that, the artist seems to take a step backwards, conducts a musical inventory and then proceeds in a positive direction.

With this in mind, I picked up a copy of Copper Blue, the just-released album by Bob Mould's newly-formed power trio, Sugar. This of course, is not to say that Mould is a stranger to the practice of record-making.

Quite the contrary actually, as Copper Blue is merely his third effort since his departure from the now-legendary Minneapolis power punk trio, Husker Du. The new album does, however, mirror the sound of his old band far more closely than his previous solo works: his stunning 1989 solo debut, Workbook and 1990's horribly mediocre follow—up, Black Sheets of Rain.

Lyrically, Mould seems to have finally dug himself out of the deep, dark hole of depression that predominated the tracks on the Black Sheets album and has returned to his old writing style that has endeared him to so many over the years. That is, focusing on human relations, the wonder of simple, everyday events and the tragedy of broken communications.

This artistic trip back to the future is immediately evident in the opening track, "The Act We Act", a riff-grinder that hasn't lost any of its heart, bringing back memories of Mould's Zen Arcade heyday. His uncanny ability to analyze personal mind games that people play comes to a head in this song, as he echoes the sentiments of everyone who's ever grown tired of the nonsense that so many people seem to provide

What's on HSCN this week

By JAMIE GORNSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Hey there, Christian Slater lovers! Good news! He's hot, he's blonde, and he's on HSCN this week with his sister, Helen, in The Legend of Billie Jean, and all by his cute self in Pump up the Volume. There are quite a few other flicks to catch this week on good ol' channel 7, so keep that popcorn popping for these movies that'll be running until next Wednesday.

City Slickers — Billy Crystal, Daniel Stern, Bruno Kirby. Portrays middle-aged men on the verge of a middle-aged crisis. They go to a ranch and meet up with a crusty range-rider (Jack Palance — Best Supporting Actor) who teaches Crystal a thing or two about what really matters in life. Acting all-around is top rate, and the one-liners will leave you in stitches.*

Flatliners — Kiefer Sutherland, Julia Roberts, Kevin Bacon. Takes the intriguing idea of medical students experiencing their own deaths and then being brought back to life and then completely loses that idea. It's confusing, it's stupid in parts, and begins to make absolutely no sense. Roberts is not at her best, and Bacon does not act up to his full potential. Sutherland is pretty good, and the fancy camera work is a saving grace, but you really have to pay attention to get it. The question is, do you really want to?

Flowers in the Attic — Victoria Tennant, Kristy Swanson, Jeb Stuart Adams. This movie does absolutely no justice to the book from which it was based. The story line is changed to the point where avid V.C. Andrews readers like myself are pissed off at the producers. The children in the book are supposed to be breathtakingly beautiful, as is the mother. To put it mildly,the actors are a bunch of dogs. Woof! Usually pretty Kristy Swanson looks frumpy and overacts so badly, you just want to wince. And what trash barrel did they they scrape to find the ogre that plays the older brother Chris? Ugh. Don't get me started. NO STARS!!

The Golden Child — Eddie Murphy, Charlotte Lewis, Charles Dance. Well, not to dwell on bad movies or anything, but this one bit the big one. This supposedly perfect child with intense magical powers is kidnapped in accordance with an ancient foretelling. Now, if this kid is so powerful, how did he allow himself to be kidnapped? And who was the genius who decided that Eddie Murphy was the only one in the world to save him? Murphy should stay with his forte — comedy. Not this — it's below him. NO STARS!!

Hot Shots — Charlie Sheen, Lloyd Bridges, Valerina Golino. FINALLY! A funny movie. It's a take off on Top Gun, 9 1/2 weeks, and a few others thrown in there. It's a traditionally slapstick Zucker movie, in the same pattern as Airplane! and the Naked Gun. A few scenes are hysterical, and there's one or two where I was literally on the floor. If you haven't seen it, you really should catch it. What the heck, the cable's already paid for, right? ***

The Hunt for the Red October— Sean Connery, Alec Baldwin. Outstanding screen adaptation of the Clancy bestseller. A Soviet submarine captain (Connery) may or may not be trying to defect, and an American intelligence (somewhat of an oxymoron, isn't it? Just kidding!) agent (Baldwin) tries to predict Connery's every step. Another brilliant performance by Connery. ****

Iron Eagle — Louis Gossett, Jr., Jason Gedrick, David Suchet. Oooh boy, here's another one where you shouldn't get me started. Nice premise. . . an 18-year-old, gum-chewing, walkman- toting, Rock 'n Roll-loving kid flies a — get this — F-16 fighter jet to the Middle East to save his POW dad. (Gratuitous vomitting) Oh, sure makes sense to me, how about you? What a waste of time for Gossett. But Gedrick better get some acting lessons, and quick. NO STARS.

Jagged Edge — Jeff Bridges, Glennn Close, Robert Loggia. CLose is a lawyer who will defend her client only if she believes he is innocent of murdering his wife. Well, she believes him as well as falls in love with him. But nothing is ever as it seems, right? Too many loopholes in the plot, ruining some of its credibility, but generally a good movie.

The Legend of Billie Jean — Helen Slater, Keith Gordon, Christian Slater. A pretty decent movie about a group of Texas teens who are on the run after a girl (Helen Slater) and her brother (Christian Slater) are unjustly accused of crimes they did not commit, spurred by a misunderstanding over a motorbike. The two, as well as a couple of their friends, are turned into local heroes for standing up for what they believe in. **

Movies on HSCN but not reviewed are The Addams Family, Dusty, End of the World Man, Geisha Bay, Heidi, I Own the Race Course, Lord of the Flies, Metropolitan, My Other Husband, Night Patrol, Say Anything, Shining Through, Urban Cowboy, Permanent Record, and Welcome Home Roxie Carmichael.

with regularity.

Other outstanding tracks include "Changes", which is another relationship song that analyzes the uncertainty angle to a greater degree than most songwriters will touch upon. Rather than wallowing in despair, however, Mould sheds light upon it all and seems to state that rationality will triumph over all. This is quite a switch from saying "I don't know if the sun ever smiles," and quite a step up, at that.

The centerpiece of the album, however, is "Hoover Dam," which could be the best written crossroads theme song this side of Robert Frost. Not only is it Mould's favorite song on the album, it may be one of his best-written ever, if only for the nifty synthesizer solo that kicks up in the middle.

When assembling Sugar this past winter, Mould seemed to take a page from David Bowie's Tin Machine book, in the sense that he chose two relatively unknown musicians to join him as opposed to the Tony Maimone-Anton Fier backup bands that he had formerly incorporated.

In addition to Mould, the band consists of bassist David Barbe and drummer Malcolm Travis. It appears that the general desire is for the band as a whole to be stressed, much like Tin Machine. It seems that this new environment has taken a good deal of pressure off Mould and has enabled him to produce some of the finest songs of his career.

All of these factors contribute to make Copper Blue a refreshing change of pace.

POW controversy remains under fire

By WILLIAM M. WELCH
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The top military officer at the end of the Vietnam War told a Senate panel Thursday that the nation "didn't have the stomach" to resume fighting over possible unreleased POWs after peace had been negotiated.

Adm. Thomas Moorer, who was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff from 1970 to 1974, said it was politically impossible for President Nixon to reopen the war in 1973 on the possibility that not all Americans had been returned from Laos.

At that time, in 1973, Nixon had concluded peace talks with the North Vietnamese. The government of Laos was not represented in the negotiations, and Nixon was preparing to hold welcoming ceremonies for U.S. POW's released under those Paris peace accords.

"We would have had to go to Laos ... and physically sweep out the whole area," Moorer said.

"We didn't have the stomach for it. We didn't have the will," Moorer said, adding later that he referred to the nation as a whole, not just military and Nixon administration officials.

Moorer testified before the Senate Select Committee on POW/MIA Affairs as it held a third day of hearings with former military and Nixon administration officials from two decades ago.

Some former officials have testified there was reason to believe that more Americans than the nine eventually released from Laos had been held in that country as a result of the the fighting in Southeast Asia.

Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger also acknowledged the possibility there may have been more living Americans in Laos, though he denounced as "a flat-out lie" the allegation U.S. officials knowingly abandoned Americans there.

Committee Chairman John Kerry, D-Mass., said, "The evidence is overwhelming to the committee there is a gap between stated public policy at that time and reality."

In a just-released deposition to the committee, Moorer was questioned about orders he issued in March 1973 to delay withdrawing the final U.S. troops in Vietnam until a full accounting of POWs had been provided. One day later, Moorer reversed those orders.

"When this started and the POWs came back and so on and there was a very euphoric reception and the wives of POWs came "to the White House" and so on and press release after press release (said) that we were withdrawing the troops, at that point, no president could have said, 'Oops, we're not going to withdraw the troops'," Moorer said in his deposition.

Testifying Thursday, Moorer said it "wouldn't have been fair" to the POWs accounted for by North Vietnam to have delayed their release while the United States pursued a search for others. He also said the officials had no confirmed information about other Americans believed to be held but not accounted for.

"If we'd known the identity and location of certain POWs, we'd have done something about it," he said.

Asian students feel stiffed by the University

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Correspondent

Editor's note: this one in a series examining multiculturalism from several different perspectives

Paul Gee, an undergraduate and current president of the Asian American Student Association (AASA) is convinced that the administration has not adequately addressed the concerns of Asian students attending the University.

In a meeting with members of the AASA, the question of cultural awareness was discussed among undergraduate student leaders. The association was formed 14 years ago to help provide a cultural base and meet the special needs of Asian students.

"We continue to be underfunded and unrepresented," Gee said.

Gee sees multiculturalism as inclusive of all nations. In the United States, he said, there isn't just one culture; it's made up of many.

"Within this paradigm we find that there is a dominant culture that does not want to acknowledge cultural differences," said Gee.

John Wong, AASA treasurer, said not investing or supporting the club demonstrates a lack of sensitivity by the University.

"The Asian students question the administration's gestures as a sign of tokenism, and lack geniune commitment." Wong said

"We are planning a 'Learning Thru the Community' film series. The purpose of the series is to educate students and faculty and serve as a mechanism to break down pre-conceived ideas

Porter caught in tug-of-war

Former priest wanted in Massachusetts, Minnesota

By JIMMY GOLEN
Associated Press

STILLWATER, Minn.- A former Roman Catholic priest charged with molesting dozens of parish children has become caught in a tug-of-war between two states, his attorney said Thursday.

James R. Porter was released on $1,000 bond after being arraigned in Washington County, Minn. District Court on six charges of fourth-degree criminal sexual conduct involving a family baby sitter.

The 57-year-old father of four winked at his wife as he filed into Judge David Doyscher's courtroom in this St. Croix River town about 15 miles east of St. Paul.

The court appearance came one day after Porter appeared in Bristol Superior Court in Massachusetts, where he faces 46 counts of criminal sexual conduct.

He was arrested in connection with the baby sitter case Wednesday night when his plane landed in the Twin Cities.

One of Porter's attorney's, Paul Lukas, criticized the timing of the arrest and said there was little danger that Porter wouldn't show up for his court appearences.

"Mr. Porter got out (of Massachusetts), got on a plane. He didn't buy a ticket to Guam or anything, he got one (to come) here, and he was ready to appear," Lukas said.

"If you can count, you can tell he's in a lot more trouble in Massachusetts. It's not hard to see he's got a lot of work to do there. If he's going to flee anywhere he's going to flee here."

Porter is accused of molesting dozens of children in Minnesota, Massachusetts and New Mexico.

Northeastern U cuts 3 programs

BOSTON (AP) — The President of Northeastern University said Thursday that the school is making progress in controlling its projected deficits, but may eliminate more programs.

"We are faced with a period of adversity that will not end soon," President John A. Curry told students, faculty and staff. "Unless we make a strong commitment to selective excellence, we will founder in universal mediocrity."

The speech by the chief executive of the nation's largest private university included an accounting of how much money is brought in by each new student, praise for the most profitable departments and harsh public criticism of divisions that cost more than they take in.

Freshman enrollment at Northeastern is 2,760 this fall, a slight increase in the number of freshmen came at the cost of $2.5 million in financial aid that will have to come out of this year's $217 million budget.

Northeastern had 49,225 graduate ad undergraduate students last year, which administrators say makes it the nation's largest private university. Current enrollment figures are not yet available.

Department heads have been asked to cut $5 million in costs this year. Three undergraduate programs are being eliminated and 11 others merged. Plans call for Northeastern's eight separate colleges to eventually be whittled down to six.

Curry promised additional cuts in "areas marginal to the university's mission."

He tied several program changes to their cost or profit.

Curry said new faculty positions and library improvements were approved for the law school in exchange for its agreement to expand enrollments, generate more revenue and broaden fund-raising efforts.

But he publicly berated the College of Business Administration, where undergraduate enrollments are falling.

Curry said a 15-year decline in the number of traditional-age college students and cuts in aid to higher education mean the problems show no sign of ending.

UMass Police Log

Compiled by Michael Day
Recent incidents recorded by the University's Department of Public Safety.

• A man reported to University Police that his van was broken into on Wednesday at approximately 4:30 p.m. Stolen from the van, which was parked in the Campus Center Garage, were five high quality Trade Show mats worth an estimated $1250, according to police.

• A man reported to police that he was threatened by several other males on Wednesday at 10:25 p.m. in connection with a previous incident, according to police. The incident occurred in Brown Residence Hall. Police issued the four subjects trespass notices.

• A West Springfield man was arrested and charged with motor vehicle violations during a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue late Wednesday evening. Police said John Casey, 20, was charged with operating a vehicle with a suspended license and operating an unregistered motor vehicle.

• Police were notified on Wednesday at 7:25 p.m. that a man suffered a diabetic reaction while showering in Brown Residence Hall. The man was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital by an Amherst Fire Dept. ambulance.

and barriers," Gee said.

"It opens the students up to various issues and different views that are not talked about or discussed in the classroom environment," said Wong.

The AASA "statement of mission" has been revised to reflect the conscious goals of the group: "To create a supportive atmosphere for all Asian and Asian American students," and "to serve the needs and interest of Asian and Asian American students."

The statement also reads, "We advocate unity among Asians and Asian Americans, promote the (views, voices and experiences) of Asians and Asian Americans. Thus build a cultural base for social, political, cultural interaction. And facilitate understanding and awareness of the Asian and Asian Americans at the University and the community at large."

Gee expressed great conviction regarding the coming tenth anniversary of Asian Night at UMass, which is set to take place in early March 1993. This is a special night that goes deeper and beyond the celebration of culture.

"This event will be dedicated to those before us, who strove to hold on to their ethnicity and as a result lost their lives," said Gee.

Asian Night is being planned as an outreach in conjunction with the five-college network. In addition to this major event, AASA is also in the process of coordinating a five-college picnic for the coming year. The AASA team wishes to set a precedent and serve as a model for future generations.

"We want the University and the community to know that we are here and we have so much to contribute," said Wong. The AASA team wishes to set a precedent and serve as a model for future generations.

Cut Your Risk of Dying in a Home Fire in Half

Having a smoke detector in your home cuts your risk of dying if you have a home fire nearly in half. But you can do even better than that:

Develop and practice a home escape plan and you cut your risk even more. Test your smoke detectors regularly and keep them operating to increase your chances of surviving a home fire even more.

Make sure you have working smoke detectors outside every sleeping area and on each additional level of your home, including the basement. Test them weekly and install new batteries at least once a year.

Bush, Clinton seen as soft on int'l policy

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Neither President Bush nor Democratic nominee Bill Clinton have formulated a comprehensive plan for foreign policy and both have downplayed the importance of foreign policy in the 1992 presidential election, according to several experts from the Five College area.

Smith College government professor Susan Peterson, Mount Holyoke government professor Vincent Ferraro and Michael Klare, a political science professor at Hampshire College, offered these views at a lecture titled "Foreign Policy and the 1992 Election," Tuesday night at Amherst College.

Peterson said although Americans seldom vote on the basis of foreign policy issues, the focus on foreign policy has been even less in the 1992 campaign because both candidates have shied away from foreign policy issues.

"There has been next to no discourse on foreign policy during the campaign," Peterson said. "The reason why is neither candidate has a foreign policy."

Many voters have come to question Bush on the two issues he claims the most credit for — the end of communism in the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe and the Persian Gulf War, Peterson said.

Peterson said Bush has been widely perceived as not having played a significant role in the ending of commu-

Family values analyzed in 'Basic Instinct'

By University News Office

Dan Quayle might blame the ills of society on the insidious messages of "the Hollywood establishment." But according to University of Massachusetts film Professor Don Levine, there is a lot more to family values in films — even films like "Basic Instinct" and "Fatal Attraction" — than meets the eye.

"These films are rife with reactionary messages about the role of women in society and the place of the family," says Levine. "They are popular because they confirm, even if only subconsciously, something about our attitudes towards sex and family."

For instance, when Levin saw "Basic Instinct", he says he almost jumped out of his seat at the symbolism of the phallic ice pick. "You have a woman who is wealthy, very smart and independent and as a result she has to be presented as a cold, murderous, sexual deviant.

Interestingly, she started out by murdering her own family, and is attracted to and surrounds herself with women who have done the same."

Similarly, when Levine viewed "Fatal Attraction," he was amazed at the subtle depiction of the psychological phenomenon in which a man fears his penis will be bitten off by hidden teeth within the vagina during intercourse.

"There's this moment during the sex scene in which Glen Close bites Michael Douglas on the shoulder until he cries out in pain.

This unmarried, successful career woman — slowly driven insane by here lack of husband and children — is a kind of fairy tale embodiment of men's fears of unbridled female sexuality, of sexuality untamed by marriage."

If Levine's ideas about film sound strange, they shouldn't. For over 20 years now Levine has been teaching popular courses on the social significance of film.

And while his unflinching focus on hidden sexual symbolism might not make him the ultimate movie date, it does help make him one of the most sought-after professors at the University.

Indeed, two years ago, Levine helped set up one of the few programs in the country devoted exclusively to "reading" the unspoken messages in film.

Called the film analysis track within the department of comparative literature at the University, this major looks less at the making of film than at its significance as cultural artifact. The major has grown from five to 30 students since 1990 and shows no signs of abating.

What makes the film major so popular, Levine believes, is that it taps into something society as a whole is becoming increasingly aware of — namely, that in their intersection between unconscious entertainment and deliberate manipulation, movies reveal something essential about the gap between who we are and who we think we are.

"Take a film like 'Thelma and Louise,'" says Levine. "No one in Hollywood expected this to be such a big hit. And yet it swept in the Oscars and the money. It tapped into something in the national zeitgeist. Like literature in the 19th century, movies are the barometer by which we can read ourselves."

Durfee Conservatory

The most tropical place on campus

By PATRICIA CRONIN
Collegian Correspondent

The "crowning glory of the school" is how John Tirstan, director of the Durfee Conservatory, describes this sanctuary of exotic plants, gardens and fish.

Celebrating its 125th anniversary, Durfee still holds its magic that once drew the attention and envy of the Victorian community.

It's a relaxing retreat from the rigors of everyday campus life because of its year-round tropical temperatures.

"It's one of the best places on campus," Tirstan says.

But this wondrous place has a lot more to offer than a rich history and a great climate. Have you ever seen potatoes growing from the sky, plants that are over a hundred years old or a majestic room filled with

Campus pond polluted, filled with oil and dirt

By RACHEL MILLER
Collegian Correspondent

For the next three months the spotlight will be on the Campus Pond as it celebrates its 100th Anniversary. And this presents an opportunity to dispel some rumors about the pond and set the facts straight.

People who visit the pond remember it mostly for its "peacefullness" says Bill Lambert, University Landscape Architect and resident pond expert.

Of all the places on campus requested by individuals to hold functions, which have included wedding ceremonies, concerts and demonstrations, Lambert says that the pond is the most popular.

But what about those rumors that this tranquil body of water is infested with rats the size of dogs and its murky waters are polluted and bottomless?

According to Lambert, the pond is far from bottomless. In most areas it reaches a depth of four to five feet, the deepest point being eight feet at the end near the Campus Center.

But the polluted waters are not a myth. Many pollutants, including motor oil, dirt and human excrement wash into the pond because the watershed area that feeds the pond is the downtown Amherst area.

While this may deter any sane person from taking a quick dip, it does not keep assorted wildlife away.

Lambert claims that they take "careful" measures to keep out any rats, but "there are a lot of fairly large carp and many types of insects" that call the pond home.

The pond also receives a large quantity of sediment accumulation and needs to be dredged periodically.

This is an expensive procedure and Lambert says that the funds are not currently available to complete the job.

As a result of the construction of the Fine Arts Center in 1975, the size of the pond was enlarged by a "few feet" at the south end.

Before the current island was built there was a natural island in the center of the pond but, due to erosion, the last vestiges were washed away by the late 1960's.

Lambert also explained that the reason the pond no longer freezes solid is due to the warm water lines that run deep beneath the ground.

Regarding the smell of the pond, Levine says, "It has always stunk."

Some real gun control

Here goes nothing . . . The best advice given to me in the last ten days was something to the effect of, "Give it to 'em Mike, stick to your guns."

I couldn't ever give you guys anything less than both barrels, so let's examine one of the biggest problems in the United States today: gun control.

Michael MORRISSEY

Stop. Don't leave me. You may think that gun control has nothing to do with you or it isn't a big deal. Think again. Crime is more rampant today than ever before, and even our great University has students that moonlight as murderers. The criminals of the world are everywhere with their illegal weapons.

Yet the average man today has an impossible time purchasing a gun, due to the bureaucratic red tape. I feel that the United States today is a long way from the principles and aspirations of our founding fathers. As far as I can tell, the rights of people to bear arms to protect themselves weren't meant to ever be taken away. This was a principle of our Bill of Rights.

Yet today, our University admits criminals who pack guns while our state passes the most restrictive laws in the country against owning firearms. In Massachusetts, guns are too difficult for upstanding citizens to obtain legally and too easy for the filth of the world to obtain illegally.

I envision a world where every man and woman can protect their home and family adequately. My liberal counterparts envision a world where guns are impossible for the average working man to obtain or worse yet, entirely outlawed. To them I say, read the five-cent bumper sticker with a million dollars worth of truth: "If guns are outlawed, only outlaws will have guns."

Obviously the problem has never been with non-criminals owning guns. The problem has been the career criminals in organized crime and teenagers in gangs who run large scale gun operations.

My point is this: let's first stop the flow of guns illegally into our country, like the AK-47. Extradite kingpins who run them, and prosecute them to the letter of the law.

Secondly, let's increase the penalty of those who have guns illegally in our country. Make a six-year jail term mandatory for anyone over the age of 16 found in illegal possession of a gun.

"But they're so young," cry the bleeding heart liberals who have a tendency to ignore the bleeding head victims, who were senselessly killed by illegal guns.

Thirdly, crack down on convicted criminals who own guns. If you commit a felony, you should never have the right to own a gun again. If you are caught with an illegal gun, you go to jail for life, no parole, no furlough. This will eliminate the vile filth of our country.

Fourth, let's allow easier access and more openness for upstanding citizens with good morals to obtain guns. Every applicant for a firearm should bring two witnesses and sign legal statements that the applicant is sound of mind and is capable of owning a gun. Also make the applicant aware of the penalties.

Right now hardly any upstanding citizens can carry concealed firarms, and when a firearm application is filled out, the bureaucracy has a tendency to sit on it needlessly. The police are generally decent in this respect, but there is room for change.

In our legal system today, a burglar who is shot but not killed on your property can file a lawsuit and generally win.

Where is the justice in that? He shouldn't be rewarded for his dasteredly actions, he should be taught a lesson. Let's make sure we punish him similar to how he punishes his victims.

Finally, I advocate gun control, real gun control. I advocate that every citizen learn about firearms first, train themselves and then purchase them. Teach your spouse and children at an early age how to handle a firearm, and explain very specifically what the consequences are. Make sure firearms aren't used carelessly, and let's keep them away from vermin.

Because when brutal criminals make the move from the heart of the city to your suburban home, they'll sure as hell be ready. Will you?

Courtesy versus respect

Courtesy. Yes, it is something we were all taught at an early age. "Say please." "Say thank you." I honestly do not encounter too many impolite people at UMass. In fact the years I've been here, everyone's been pretty polite. Rushing through the Campus Center on my way to class I have exchanged probably thousands of "excuse me's" and "thank you's" to people who held doors open for me or jumped out of my way to let me plow through to class.

Stacy MALONE

Over-courtesy. Traditionalism to an insulting extent. You can keep it. I don't want anyone to go out of their way to hold a door for me simply because I am a woman. I find it very insulting when a man thinks he is doing something chivalrous for me by opening a door. If he is ahead of me and holds the door for me, I really do appreciate it and definitely prefer it to him slamming the door in my face. When a man goes out of his way for me because I am a woman then he is slamming a door in my face- the door of equality.

The days of men leaping around the car for women to open their door and running yards to reach the door handle before the woman are out of style. Respect is in. Men screaming catcalls and telling degrading jokes at the expense of women are out of style. Respect is in. Men treating them like objects without feelings or brains are out of style. Respect is in. Not just respect for women, but respect for all people.

The days of men sexauly harassing and sexually assaulting women should be out of style. Women are people. Men raping women should be out of style. Women are people. Men receiving higher pay than women for the same job should be out of style. Women are people. Women are people and deserve respect, like all people deserve respect.

Women need the opportunities to have doors to open. Equality will give women more opportunities. It is very rude to slam a door in anyone's face, but women have had doors slammed in their faces all throughout history. Slamming doors in the faces of women is no longer just rude, but discriminatory. People deserve and need equal opportunities. Women are people and should have these same rights as any other person would receive .

Give women the respect they deserve as people and individuals. Women should have the respect from men of being courteous like they would to any other person. Not just the "say please" and "thank you" politeness, but the courtesy of equality. Women are people and should be given respect. There is no question about it and to argue whether women should be given respect as people would be a great insult.

Courtesy. Yes, it was something we were all taught at an early age. Respect. Yes, it is something that many men are still learning.

Uprising and freedom of speech

In response to the excellent article written by Martin F. Jones "The Rodney King verdict: No turning back" [Collegian, Sept. 16] I felt an urgent need to communicate both my complete support for his basic political views (e.g. ". . . no one could deny that our nation is a fundamentally racist institution.") as well as raise objection to his apparent endosement of a specifically anti-free speech and anti-democratic tactic:

". . . supporters of the expelled editors of color responded by removing that day's edition of the Collegian from its distributive points around campus and disposing of them . . This act proved to be effective."

As Martin Jones importantly observes, the social and political climate in the US is one of desparation and despair, of poverty and institutionalized racism for people of color and other minorities. The situation for the activist left is in a state of disarray, lacking the power to even preserve the basic social reforms of the past, let alone win new reforms from the government. Thus it is more important than ever to draw political lessons from both the social movements of the past as well as from the inspriational leaders of those movements.

Although it is important that Jones fully champions militant struggle and the fundamental right of self-defense, as embodied by Fredrick Douglas and Malcolm X among others, he does them a grave injustice by endorsing an anti-free speech tactic which is fundamentally incompatible with the political principles of those same movement leaders.

It is not only possible to simultaneously support the right of self defense and hold a principled postion in support of the right to free speech, but it had already been done by Malcolm X, Fredrick Douglas, Sojourner Truth and many others!

Their struggles were based on a rigorous and principled defense of the right to speak, the right to organize and the right to distribute information. To these political activists, tactics such as censorship, acts of terrorism or even voting for tweedledee/tweedledum, were seen explicitly as substitutes to organizing militant mass action. These tactics were only symptomatic of a failure of movements to organize and struggle for reforms democratically, and in a way that built and strengthened grass-roots movements.

Censorship is a tool which only serves the interests of those who wish to continue to oppress and exploit us; who will only turn around and more effectively censor us. We can not afford to lend legitamacy to a tactic which is fundamentally hostile to genuine democratic movements and the teachings of the likes of Malcolm X, Fredrick Douglas, and Sojourner Truth.

The clearest example of this point was the experience of Ida B. Wells who was the single greatest fighter in the anti-lynching movement around the turn of the century.

For Ida B. Wells, freedom of speech was an invaluable tool for waging a militant struggle for Black liberation and was unwavering in her opposition to specific attacks on her own freedom of speech. Her struggles represented a valuable lesson for the activists of her own period (Fredrick Douglas had nothing but complete admiration for her work), and continue to hold valuable lessons for the activists of today.

Escort service fails to accomplish mission

Thanks to the bull—— escort service, I was duped into walking the entire length of campus alone at midnight. I don't mean to sound like a wimp—I have nothing against walking long distances—but when dealing with such an illustrious track record as the University tries hard not to disclose, walking between two distant points on campus in the dark is a less than pleasant experience. I realize they may be understaffed, but I think I gave them too many breaks this time.

I called to tell them I would be taking my car to E lot and asked if I might be able to get an escort back to Orchard Hill. Although they picked me up before when I called ahead, this time a woman informed me that I had to call from the phone in E lot.

When I called from E lot, having taken my car there at 11:55, they told me they were "booked" until 12:10, and then there would be a shift change so I would have to call back at 12:30 and even then there might be no one to help me. I find it outrageous that they thought I was going to stand around in an isolated lot for over half an hour in hope that I get an escort!

What really pisses me off is that I didn't need to stand around looking over my shoulder. I was in no hurry to drive to the parking lot that moment. I called ahead so such an incident of stupidity could have been avoided. They could have told me then. I was a hell of a lot safer in my dorm, and was quite willing to wait until it was convenient for them to escort me.

If UMass spent less time putting out propaganda about the "wonderful" services they offer, perhaps they'd have more time to deliver them. They complain about understaffing; thank God my money is going to an arena which won't be done before I graduate rather than upping the quality of existing staffing and services.

Yeah, I made it back to my dorm room — no problem. But how many rapes does it take to validate the necessity of a better escort service? How many more before they can at least stop feeding us useless bull——? I'm fed up.

Tirade wasn't news

There's nothing like a little exploitation to grab people's attention, is there? I was insulted by Alexander Nguyen's lack of regard for the intelligence of the Collegian readership presented on this semester's first Multicultural Affairs page [Collegian, Sept. 23]. His grandstanding tabloid-style sensationalism is revolting in the context of such an important topic.

I took part in the fight to save the diversity pages last semester. If this is an example of what I and so many others have fought for, then I am ashamed. Why couldn't this tirade have run on the Editorial/Opinion page next to Michael Morrissey?

This is not an example of multiculturalism, nor is it what the diversity pages should be about. This is an opinion piece masquerading as news.

nism. Many also share Democratic vice-presidential candidate Al Gore's view that Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein has been able to "thumb his nose at the world," by defying attempts by the United Nations to inspect Iraqi nuclear capabilities, according to Peterson.

Ferraro said Clinton doesn't have to "win" the foreign policy debate with Bush, he just has to prove he's "just as good."

Despite the fact that foreign policy has not been overtly stressed by either candidate, foreign policy "has been a driving force behind many of the major issues in the campaign," Ferraro said.

Ferraro said the questions over Clinton's draft record during the Vietnam War are a "referendum on U.S. interventionism" in perceived trouble spots throughout the world.

Also, Clinton's stress on providing well-paying manufacturing jobs to American workers are an implicit criticism of President Bush's support for free trade, an issue which bears particularly on U.S. relations with neighboring Canada and Mexico, Ferraro said.

Finally, questions about the environment and the response of the United States to ethnic violence largely hinge upon foreign considerations. Ferraro said neither candidate has made the link between domestic racism and racial and ethnic tensions throughout the world.

Klare said both candidates have exhibited a great deal of similarity on a number of major issues, including the future direction of the U.S. defense budget, nuclear weapons, the identification of Third World conflicts as the major threat to U.S. interests and the success of U.S. military technology.

The similarity between candidates stems "not so much from their own internal views, but rather from external events," Klare said.

Klare said the decline of the Soviet Union has left the United States without a clear-cut enemy to help shape U.S. defense policy.

Klare said he believed both candidates' "enemy list" serve as indications of the directions they would like to shift U.S. foreign policy. Klare said Bush's enemy list would probably consist of North Korea, Iraq and Libya.

Clinton's enemy list would probably include Syria, China and South Africa, indicating Clinton's interest in "issues around democratization."

Spotlight on a Reckless costume designer

By CUTTER GARCIA
Collegian Staff

This week's Spotlight feature is on Ken Chu a hard working costume designer for the Theater Dept.

CG: Give me a little background on Ken Chu.
KC: I'm 22. I'm a senior. I'm from Boston and I'm a Theater major.
CG: You're the Costume Designer (CD) for the Theater deptartment's production of RECKLESS this semester. Tell me about what you do.
KC: I read the play. I try to interpret a visual aspect of costumes for the characters and I design them as best I can to fit the specific characterization's of what or who those characters are. Then I design the costumes working with the costume shop.
CG: Now when you say DESIGN, do you mean getting a shirt or dress that already exists or the actual building of the costumes from scratch?
KC: Some of it is built and some of it is pulled. The costume shop has a really huge stock closet so there's a lot that I can pull from there. I get a lot of things from the costume shop because I also have to keep in mind my budget. If I see something in there that I like for a character I'll pull that so I can save money. But we do build costumes as well.
CG: The director of RECKLESS, Ed Golden, has a sort of 'Demi-God' reputation about him amongst theater students. How is it working with him?
KC: (Laughing) It's really interesting. It's different working with him as an actor...as a student you get the sense that everything Ed says is right and basically it is, it really is because when you're not listening to Ed you feel off the mark and when you are listening you feel on the mark, but as a designer I think I see a very different side of Ed. He becomes more human and more of a peer as opposed to someone high above you.
CG: Where do you want to be five years from now?
KC: Designing professionally, hopefully.
CG: You're also a brother at Lambda Chi Alpha. Are your brothers acceptive of your talents, and how is that environment for you?
KC: I think it's really different. I'm really happy about being a brother at Lambda Chi and about being a part of the Greek Area. I think that the Greek system offers me something very different from what you get in academics or anything else on campus.

Ken Chu
JOSH REYNOLDS/COLLEGIAN

My brothers are all very receptive. Actually, some have asked me for help on shows that they want to audition for and they come to see the shows that I'm involved with. It is a very accepting environment for me. In fact, it's a lot more receptive from the Lambda Chi end towards my theater vs. my theater friends being accepting of my membership in a fraternity.
CG: As a proud member of Theta Chi it will be a joy to see that answer in print. Now you didn't originally start out as a CD - right?
KC: When I originally got involved with theater I wanted to be a playwright, but I found that that wasn't my forte. Then I got really involved in acting and enjoyed it a lot. I love acting and was planning on going through with that, but a year ago I took a designing class with June Gaeke. I really loved it, and the work I did got a lot of praise there. And that's a big thing in theater — being recognized for your craft. So that gave me an indication that I could do really good work as a CD. After that class I got picked to design a couple of shows (IN MY ABYSS by the SVP and MAMA at Hampshire college).
CG: Having become a CD do you find yourself being really critical when you see a play or a movie?
KC: (Laughing) I think all theater majors are like that. Especially since our Theater department is so foundation based. Penny Remsen (a lighting design proffessor) said, "After you become a Theater major, whatever you watch whether it's a play or a movie - it will never be the same again. 'This sucks!' or 'I'd do that differently!'".
CG: How much freedom is a CD given?
KC: That depends a lot on the director. The CD's job is to be visual, to develop a visual concept. A lot of times the CD needs to have guidelines to design things which the director feels strongly about visually but if the CD feels that the director is making a bad choice visually, then it's the CD's position to present that issue and offer a solution. There is definitely a lot of freedom associated with being a CD but there is also a definite framework within which the CD needs to work.
CG: You work in the Undergrad's Admission Office, take classes, are a member of a fraternity and function as the CD for RECKLESS - how do you balance it all?
KC: My life is busy but I like it that way. I'd be too bored if it were otherwise. I enjoy working.
CG: Finally, my old staple, give me Ken Chu's philosophy on life.
KC: Just do it! That says it all.

I'm constantly on the search for new interviews so if you know someone involved with the ARTS who deserves a little recognition stop by the COLLEGIAN and leave a note in the ARTS box telling me a little bit about them and how I can get in touch.
Thanks - Cutter

A sample of new fall sounds

by CALEB COCHRAN
Collegian Correspondent

While pop vocalist Madonna has captured headlines recently for her acting career and her new book, four bands have actually released new albums and produced some of the best music of the year.

The second release from the Spin Doctors, Pocket Full of Kryptonite, is definitely one of the year's best albums. I bought this one after hearing "Little Miss Can't Be Wrong" on the radio, which caught my attention with its witty lyrics and original yet slightly unpolished sound. As it turns out, this is just one of several great songs on the album.

"Jimmy Olsen's Blues" is a humorous poke at the familiar Superman-Lois Lane romance in which Jimmy persuades Lois to choose him over the Man of Steel. "More Than She Knows" is a short but effective tune which describes a woman who has everything she wants, except of course, for the man who happens to sing this song.

"Two Princes" is my favorite song on the album. It is a storybook tale of, as the title would suggest, two princes who are after the same girl. The song can just as easily be read as a tune about two modern-day men after the same woman.

The Spin Doctors have a sound similar to that of Blues Traveler, another New York band, who, not coincidentally, are good friends of the Doctors. One major difference between the two bands is that Blues Traveler is a bit more laid back. Their songs tend to wander off into guitar solo oblivion once in a while. The Spin Doctors, on the other hand, are constantly driving their music forward with no excessive noise at all. Their original sound has made them the hottest new touring act around. As the album notes proclaim, the Spin Doctors are a tonic for troubled times.

The Black Crowes stormed back onto the music scene this summer with their second album, The Southern Harmony and Musical Companion, the follow up to their brilliant debut Shake Your Money Maker. For those of you who missed their debut album, the Crowes are a bit of a throwback. They like old time rock 'n' roll, and the music they produce has a definite seventies quality to it. You won't find any sappy lyrics or cheesy guitar solos here, just foot-stomping, heart-pounding rock 'n' roll.

The Companion is a nice mix of power and finesse; hard rockers and slow ballads. The power comes into play on songs such as "Remedy," "Hotel Illness," and "My Morning Song," all of which are terrific tunes. "Bad Luck Blue Eyes Goodbye" is a nice slow song, but the gem of this album is "Thorn In My Pride," the best song the Crowes have released to date, in this listener's opinion. There's not a lot of explaining to do about this album — if you liked the first album, this one is just as good, if not better. If you didn't like the first album, I don't know what to say, because the first album was great. Go check out the new Bobby Brown or something, I don't know.

The Seattle band Nirvana came into their own this year with Nevermind. These guys are wacked. Their music is really wacked. It's basically a guy screaming his head off, a guy jamming like crazy on his guitar and a drummer banging the hell out of his drum set. Somehow, when this is put together, it makes for a great album. "Smells Like Teen Spirit" is the song everyone has heard. This is a great tune, but I prefer "Lithium," "In Bloom," and "Come As You Are." Other lively tunes include "Drain You," "Lounge Act," and "Breed." This is a slam-bang, in-your-face album which has no redeeming qualities except that it will release the headbanger in everyone, if only for a few minutes. It's also a fantastic CD to bring anywhere when you want to liven things up a bit. All in all, well worth the money.

Finally, any story on new music would not be complete without a tribute to the Beastie Boys' Check Your Head. What an album. Mike D., MCA and Adrock have done it again, only this time bolder and better than on Licensed to Ill and Paul's Boutique.

Yes, the Boys play their own instruments on this one, and they do surprisingly well, especially on "Gratitude," a thrashing piece which showcases the guitar talent of Adrock (Adam Horovitz), and "Groove Holmes," an uncharacteristically mellow tune for these guys.

Don't worry, their new found passion for instruments has not had an effect on the B Boys classic Brooklyn-accented rap, as shown on such tunes as "Pass the Mic" a simple yet addictive tune in which the B Boys rap about nothing more profound than what great rappers they are, and "So What'cha Want," another booming track which bolsters the new B Boys image of power over clever lyrics. "The Maestro," "Live at P.J.'s" and "Jimmy James" are nicely orchestrated speed-metal rap tracks. "Stand Together" and "Finger Lickin' Good" are also worth a listen.

The Beastie Boys seem determined to shed the image they created with "Fight For Your Right," and they have indeed done that. If I could only understand more of the lyrics, I'd have no complaints about this album. A great, new original style of rap from some old friends.

While I would encourage all of you to run out and buy all the albums I have mentioned here, you should also be aware that several new releases have just hit the stores. Boston's Extreme is back with III Sides to Every Story, Public Enemy is already stirring controversy over a video from Greatest Misses, and country icon Garth Brooks returns with his fourth album, The Chase. Also available in stores now is You Gotta Believe. Well, all new releases can't be great.

The Dreyfus Affair throws a curve ball

By JON LUPO

The Dreyfus Affair: A Love Story
Peter Lefcourt
Random House

Baseball, I'm told, is one of the great American obsessions. Love is another. Suppose these two came together. No big deal, right? What if the baseball player was the best shortstop in the league and his love was his second baseman?

Such is the "high concept" of The Dreyfus Affair: A Love Story, the new novel by Peter Lefcourt, author of The Deal. Lefcourt has crafted a funny, entertaining but completely digestable novel. He touches on light media and social satire as well as turning in some credible baseball writing. Unfortunately, Lefcourt strikes out more than he scores.

Randy Dreyfus is happily married to Susie and he has two children. He's the shortstop for the fictional Los Angleles Valley Vikings, his autobiography is a bestseller and a shopping center is named after him. Everything is going great for him except for one nagging feeling: he is becoming increasingly attracted to D.J. Pickett, a black second baseman on his team.

This is something shocking to Randy, who never considered himself a "lefty" and is still attracted to women ("Doc, do you think it's possible for a guy who thinks Pia Zadora's a fox to be queer?") He seeks help from a psychologist whose logical replies to Randy's problems infuriate him. But he can't keep D.J. out of his mind.

Randy seeks out D.J. and they eventually fall in love. As the pennant race leads up to the World Series, their secret affair is discovered when, in a hilarious sequence, they are found making out in a dressing room at Neiman-Marcus — and it's all on film.

This naturally causes an uproar all over America. Everyone is taking sides over whether Randy and D.J. should be allowed to play ball. Without them, the Vikings would surely lose the Series, but with them, the "integrity of the game" would be sullied.

Turn to DREYFUS, page 8

Dreyfus' wife, Susie, is stunned at the fact she had to learn about her husband's affair during the evening news (she later starts to see the same psychiatrist as Randy). The baseball commissioner is facing heat from all angles (including the President) to make a decision to eject or keep Randy and D.J. on the team. The fans are divided; some boo and hiss, others cheer. Through it all, Randy and D.J. remain together.

While the idea and execution of The Dreyfus Affair is credible, most everything about this novel is surface. What of Randy's parents' reactions to their son's homosexuality? Nothing is mentioned save a small paragraph. Even Randy is poorly drawn, leaving the reader with a sketchy lead character.

Consequently, the supporting characters are discussed even less. Susie is just a barrel of emotions. We learn nothing about D.J.'s life; his family, his childhood, etc. He seems more like the token love interest than a match for Randy.

The remaining characters are given a few well-chosen traits but none are full-bodied people. The whole book seems like a rough outline for a movie and it's no coincidence that the film rights were snatched up just after publication. Perhaps if it falls in the hands of crafty writer-director Ron Shelton (Bull Durham, White Men Can't Jump), this novel could flesh itself out and make a hilarious movie.

What The Dreyfus Affair does well is write about baseball. While this is nowhere near the par of great sports writing, author Lefcourt has a way of placing the reader in the middle of the game, if only for a moment.

As a love story, it's only fair. This is familiar territory, that is, the 'no one understands our love'- type plot. Randy and D.J. make a great couple, but everything is so perfect between them, it just doesn't ring true.

Despite the book's structural and developmental flaws, this novel is also very funny. The Dreyfus Affair is like a sugar-coated candy bar: you'll enjoy it for a while, but it will leave you with an empty feeling.

The overwhelming problem, however, is that the potential is right in the reader's face and the novel doesn't do the issues it brings up justice.

Lefcourt spends most of the novel treading when he should be diving in. By placing the novel in the baseball arena, Lefcourt skims the surface of a primal Americn contradiction: you can't be gay and All-American at the same time. The blatant prejudice in the stadium's stands and the front office reveal yet another rooted, great American pastime: hatred. But these issues are studied from a safe, benign distance.

The Dreyfus Affair is hardly a home run. But it is one of the most accessible gay-themed novels around and worth a look if you're interested. But The Dreyfus Affair, despite being a witty and easy read, lacks substantial depth to make it into the hall of fame.

In video: examining Woody's infidelity

By ADAM SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Correspondent

Before Mia Farrow's adopted Vietnamese daughter Soon Yi and before Husbands and Wives there was Mariel Hemingway. That's right, Woody Allen had conquered this territory years ago in his 70's flick Manhattan.

Manhattan is a comical rendition of Isaac Davis (Woody Allen) a nebishy, Jewish Manhattanite. He becomes involved with a high school girl after his wife Jill (Meryl Streep) leaves him for another woman. This makes for a cute twist in Isaac's life because it makes him want a much younger and naive woman.

Almost all of Allen's films portray demanding New Yorkers. For this very reason, Allen is able to enter a vast arena to poke fun at the numerous New York stereotypes. Allen's character (Isaac) complains when he quits his televison writing job to write a book that he will no longer be able to afford luxuries such as two alimonies, his tennis lessons, his country house in Long Island's opulent Southampton and he fears that he won't get a good seat in svnagogue, thus making him distant from god.

The on-screen romance between Isaac and Tracy (Mariel Hemingway) comes across as being very realistic relationship. However, it is never explained how these two became attracted to each other. Maybe it was Hemingway's distinct similarity to Laurie Partridge or her Noxema fresh skin that Isaac was attracted to. How could a forty-two year old even think of hopping into bed with a sweet, soft-spoken seventeen year-old high school girl?

However, this doesn't stop the sex craved Issac from being involved with her. Allen's character tells Hemingway, "I think I'm in love with you" and "We're having a great time, but you're a kid," while at the same time being a father figure to her. The most notable line in the film is when Allen speaks about his love affair with Hemingway: "As long as the cops don't burst in, I think we're gonna break a couple of records."

Meanwhile Isaac's wife Jill (Meryl Streep), who left him for a woman named Connie, continues to upset him in her book called Marriage, Divorce, and Selfhood about her marriage to him. Allen is further upset by Jill stating in her book, "Making love to a deeper masterful female made me realize what a bizarre charade having sex with my husband was." This was one of the funniest lines in the movie.

Filmed entirely in letterbox black and white (to maintain the big screen rectangular quality) Manhattan is a terrific comedy about infidelity, statutory rape and life in the Big Apple. What Allen did was turn emotional issues into something that could be laughed at.

The cinematography at the beginning of the film uses still shots of numerous Manhattan sites such as Central Park, Washington Square Park, Times Square and the bright lights of the Broadway theatres instead of showing the infamous skyline. No titles were used to introduce the film's stars or name of the film. Instead, a shot of a vertical lit up sign is shown that says: MANHATTAN to let the viewer see the title in a semi-subtle way.

The music in the film sounds like the music used in numerous United Airline commercials. During the film I couldn't help but see a United Airlines jetliner slowly flying over the Golden Gate Bridge.

colorful tropical flowers?

The wonders to behold at Durfee are countless. Perhaps if you are having a little trouble studying in the towers in Southwest you might want to explore the Palm Room at Durfee, complete with pond, goldfish and turtles.

From the guest comment book it seems as though Durfee has inspired and healed many. In fact, Tirstan describes it as "one of the most tranquil places on campus." Durfee even offers an outside garden with flowers and vegetables and two pretty incredible trees.

In fact, Tirstan even offers places to study and soothing classical music all in a tropical climate with colorful plants and flowers.

From 1 to 5 p.m., members of the community can simply wander through the door and explore this conservatory filled with treasures.

Some students such as Business major Ron Burns volunteer by helping out at Durfee. "I make sure I come in every week, to get away from things," Burns said.

If you need more information, a tour or want to volunteer, just stop by or call 545-5234. Whatever you do, do yourself a favor this year and don't pass by this hidden jewel.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): An older person really does mean well. Make allowances. Rearrange office furniture for maximum comfort and efficiency. Jot down any money-making ideas that could come in handy later on.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Work conditions are gradually improving. Do not expect too much too soon. A meaningful romance fills you with joy. Your social plans may change at the last minute. Be flexible.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): The emphasis today is on protecting your financial security. Avoid taking any unnecessary risks. Go slow where your love life is concerned.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You could feel indecisive or pressured this morning. Why force the pace? Let your associates know that you will act when the time is right. Your intuition is reliable in family affairs.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Now that you can almost taste success, you pick up a real bargain or gain an important ally. A true meeting of minds is possible. Buy books and art supplies.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): The financial picture brightens if you continue to keep the lid on spending. Family members approve of a romantic commitment. The illness of a loved one makes you reassess your priorities.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Your career prospects improve, thanks to a lucky break. People who have opposed you in the past want to jump on your bandwagon.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): The emphasis now is on developing an enduring relationship with an attractive member of the opposite sex. Diplomacy is your best ally in business negotiations.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You cannot afford to risk your money, not even for the sake of friendship. New employment gains lie ahead; you find yourself whistling while you work!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Cultivating an unusual relationship could yield surprising rewards. Something that falls into your lap should be a real blessing. Creativity pays big dividends.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Career advancement is a top priority now. Record gains come through publicity and advertising. Romance could take an upward turn. Give a loved one a second chance.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Think twice before you speak and look before you leap. In short, take the precautions any sensible person would to prevent errors and losses. When you voice your views with authority, others listen.

Minutemen to host BC and Queens

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

When is an away tournament actually a home tournament?

When the team in question is the University of Massachusetts water polo team.

For the second straight year the Minutemen, ranked 14th nationally, are hosting a tournament at our neighbor's pool down the street, Amherst College. Last year it was the New England vs. Mid-Atlantic Challenge. This year, with Iona College and Fordahm University passing up the trip, it has been renamed the "Fall Classic."

"It's a real good opportunity for the guys on the team to play in front of their peers and friends," said UMass coach Russ Yarworth. "Maybe it will get us some exposure on campus, so people can see how good our sport is and how good we are at it."

The dimensions of Boyden Pool won't allow games to be played in it, so until the school wants to build a new pool, Yarworth must rely on the kindness of the folks at Amherst.

Like most home tournaments, no matter what the sport, the home team usually feasts on teams of lesser quality. Iona provided stiff competition last year, but with the Gaels not around there is no reason to believe UMass shouldn't pad its 7-1 record with five more wins. Only a letdown due to overconfidence could ruin these plans.

"We can't take anything for granted," Yarworth said, "but I'm looking at this whole weekend as an opportunity of getting a lot of people a lot of playing time."

Saturday morning the Minutemen will face Amherst College at 9 a.m., in what should be an easy win. Then, at 11 a.m., Queens College (0-8) will provide the opposition. The team's third game of the day will be at 7 p.m. against the Boston College Eagles.

Yarworth says Queens will field a quick team that may prove to be troublesome in the small pool of Amherst.

Sunday's first game will be at 11:30 a.m. against Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

That will be followed at 2 p.m. with a game against Yale. Both games don't figure to give the Minutemen much of a challenge.

It is a tournament where UMass has nothing to gain in the national or regional polls, and everything to lose. A defeat at the hands of any of the five teams would be a serious blow this early in the season.

UMass to visit Rutgers

Responding to adversity is what makes good teams great.

That is what the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team (5-1) hopes to prove as they enter this weekend's matchup against two-time Atlantic 10 defending champions, Rutgers University in Piscataway, NJ at 7:30 p.m.

In their last outing, a 3-1 loss to Dartmouth on the road, the Minutemen came out flat, and despite scoring first, were outshot 16-6 and overtaken in the second half by the Big Green.

Junior Matt Edgerly, in his second game back from injury, put UMass ahead when he scored off a pass from sophomore Mike Doyle with three minutes left in the first half.

In the second half though, Dartmouth came out firing and were able to beat Minuteman goalie Mark Wolf three times for the victory.

It was the first loss for UMass, who opened the season with a five game win streak. In going to Rutgers, the road is only going to get tougher for the Minutemen.

The Scarlet Knights, coached by 1991 A-10 Coach of the Year Bob Reasso, have been a dominating force in the Atlantic 10 for the last two seasons. With a gaudy 14-1 mark in the A-10 over the previous two years, Rutgers is definitely a strong candidate to repeat as champion.

Rutgers is a team which the Minutemen do not have to be pumped up to play. For players like Edgerly this is the game of the year.

"I can't wait to get down to Rutgers," he said. "It should be a showdown."

Minutemen face B.U. in YanCon battle

CHRISTOPHER EVANS/ COLLEGIAN
Rene Ingoglia and the UMass football team battle Boston University at 1:30 Saturday in the Minutemen's home opener. Ingoglia is slated to start in place of the injured John Johnson.

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

Ahhh . . . home, sweet home.

After a long, difficult two weeks on the road, the University of Massachusetts Football team will play its first home game of the season at 1:30 p.m. this Saturday in the friendly confines of Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium against conference rival Boston University.

The Minutemen, who enter the game at 0-1 in the Yankee Conference and 1-1 overall after defeating Holy Cross last weekend, would like nothing better than to give head coach Mike Hodges a win on their home turf. Hodges realizes that a victory against a squad like the tough Terriers will not come easy.

"They are very committed to a run and shoot offense which is very difficult to stop, especially since they run it so well," said Hodges. "They have a great passing game with Greg Moore and Walter Norton, Jr. at quarterback, as well as a solid receiving game (Scott Mallory, 12-43, 1 TD last week).

"What makes the run and shoot so tough to stop is that the offense is very spread out on the field and we can never be too sure whether they'll run or pass."

Other imposing figures that UMass will have to contend with include tackle Jason Goldberg (6'5" 282), who anchors a huge offensive line, tackle Paul Laudano (6'3", 253 11 tackles), and linebacker John Schaefer, who has 29 tackles on the year.

UMass suffered a few injuries last week against the Cross when redshirt freshman quarterback Andrew McNeilly reinjured his thumb and tailback John Johnson sustained a painful turf-toe. McNeilly will start this Saturday but Johnson is very doubtful for this weekend.

"Johnson may see some action against B.U. but definitely will not start because of his injury," said Hodges. "Rene Ingoglia (also a redshirt freshmen), who played just great last week (19-70 yds. rushing) will get the start.

"Ingoglia's a tough-nosed, aggressive player who we're really excited about — he had reconstructive knee surgery his senior year in high school and didn't practice at all last year, but he had a great spring practice and has played well so far this season."

One thing to look out for this Saturday is Don Caparotti (CB-SE-PR-KOR), who became UMass' first two-way player in over two deacades last Saturday.

"We'll continue to work Donny into the offense at split end occasionally," said Hodges. "He's definitely in good enough shape to play both ways but it's just a matter of getting enough practice time (at split end). When we feel that it's to our advantage to use him on defense and offense and when he does get enough practice time, we'll use him both ways."

Despite the strong Minutemen line-up which includes one of the toughest defenses in the YanCon, Hodges still has reservations about Saturdays' game.

"They're a great team defensively and they make you defend the whole field," he said. "I think if we control the line of scrimmage and stop the run, though, we'll have a good chance to win."

Game Notes: Hodges: "We need a lot of fans there this Saturday to support us so we can have a true home advantage. If we can get a lot of people there at every home game, then we'll be well on our way to gaining back that UMass winning tradition."

In case you're too lazy or hung-over to get out of bed, the game can be heard on WTTT Amherst (1430 AM), with Mike Fagerson and Jim Degnim bringing you the action and WMUA (91.1 FM) with Brian Jones and Dave Ohldread.

A-10 weekend for field hockey

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team is hoping the old adage, "What comes around, goes around" doesn't come true this weekend.

The Minutewomen (6-0), No. 5 in the country, begin their Atlantic 10 schedule today against Temple University at 3:00 p.m. in Philadelphia. On Sunday, UMass will square off against Rutgers University at 3:00 p.m. in Piscataway, NJ.

Massachusetts defeated both teams last year at home en route to a perfect A-10 regular season record, but having to face their foes on the road may make the feat more difficult this time around.

Today's game versus the No. 11 Owls (3-2) will be the Minutewomen's more difficult of the two. After a 3-1 defeat in the regular season, Temple defeated UMass in the A-10 Championship 1-0 last year in Philadelphia to capture a berth in the NCAA's. UMass had to sweat out an at large NCAA berth, and they may be looking for some revenge.

Wendy Skibitsky, Toni Byard, and Debbie Utz lead the Temple offense. Skibitsky, a forward, has five goals and one assist, leading the team in points.

Byard is second on Temple with five points on four goals and an assist, and Utz leads the Owls with four assists.

The key to stopping Temple will be controlling their penalty corner, a traditional weakness for Minutewomen teams. Lately, however, UMass has used the corner effectively.

Despite losing games to Iowa and Syracuse, Temple has still managed to muster 57 penalty corners on the season while limiting opponents to 26. The Owls have nearly mastered the corner on turf.

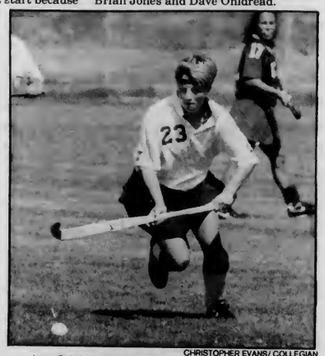
Donna Porter and Lori Benner have shared time in goal, with Porter amassing a 1.9 goals against average in four games, and Benner having a 1.6 g.a.a. in two games.

A young Rutgers squad has struggled this year to a 3-4 record thus far, but the Lady Knights can always be expected to play a physical game.

Rutgers is known for its chippy play, and last year's contest at Totman Field could not have proven the point more.

In a contest that resembled a rugby match, UMass (literally) broke away from the forechecking Lady Knights to post a victory that came with a lot of physical play.

The Minutewomen may find a tougher Temple team today and a more physical game against Rutgers Sunday, because things are always harder on the road.



CHRISTOPHER EVANS/ COLLEGIAN
Jenn Salisbury and the UMass field hockey team open their Atlantic 10 season this weekend with road games against Temple (today at 3:30 p.m.) and Rutgers (Sunday at 1:00 p.m.).

Arty looks into his crystal ball for week four

Football fans, crack open the beers and break out the barbecue, because its time for the weekly edition of Stapleton's Pigskin Picks.

We'll start this week by giving out some awards of my very own, beginning with the Babe "I'm a Loser" Laufenberg award. The winner is none other than the Chicago Bears' Richard Dent, who made a mockery of both the officials and the Giants' quarterback Phil Simms in last Monday night's game.

For those of you who did not see the game, Dent manhandled Simms repeatedly after the plays ended. It was even more ironic that the Giants' Mark Ingram was tossed for roughing. Dent, you are a mental midget, and should be suspended.

Now, the Stud of the Week goes to Michael Irvin of the Dallas Cowboys, who shredded the Phoenix defense, catching eight passes for 210 yards and three touchdowns.

For the rest of the league, it is back to work this Sunday, starting with the local team, the New England Patriots, playing host to the dominant Buffalo Bills.

The Pats are a miserable 0-2, looking powerless in the two losses to the Rams and Seattle. On the other hand, the Bills have piled on the points in their first three wins.

Here's an open plea to Coach MacPherson: first, get a real kicker who can hit an extra point. Second, teach Hugh Millen that he is supposed to throw to his receivers at the end of crucial games, not the defenders.

Patriots fans, especially my friend HD, you should hope that the game on CBS is not blacked out, because your team is in for a massacre. Buffalo 34, New England 12 (two missed extra points).

Arthur
STAPLETON

For the next game, we travel to the Windy City, where the Bears take on the Atlanta Falcons. Chicago is coming off a humiliating defeat on national television, and Atlanta was just pummelled by the Saints in a defensive struggle. Mike Ditka will not allow his team to lose two in a row with the country looking on. Chicago 17, Atlanta 13.

The game of the week is on Sunday night, as the San Francisco 49ers enter the Louisiana Superdome at 2-1 to take on the New Orleans Saints in a key divisional battle.

The New Orleans defense may cause problems for Steve Young. San Francisco will also miss the services of superior wideout John Taylor, who broke his leg last week in the victory over the Jets. Taking this into consideration, and the hostile environment the game will be played in, I'm expecting an upset. New Orleans 24, San Francisco 20.

The Power Poll this week has very much changed in the AFC. Still holding on to the number one ranking is Buffalo. Last week, Bruce Smith proved he is back from his injury, terrorizing the Colts offense with ten tackles and two and a half sacks. Houston makes a big jump this week to number two, after knocking Kansas City out with an overtime win.

Cracking the poll at the number three slot is Miami, who is undefeated at 2-0. Don't look now, but Dan Marino is up to his old record-breaking tricks.

Over in the NFC, the Philadelphia Eagles tore apart Denver, keeping the top spot in the poll. Philly is undefeated, looking like the best team in football, but we know what injuries can do.

The number two team is once again the Cowboys, who are appearing to be suspect on the defensive side. After

Report alleges bias, 'lending gap' shown

BOSTON (AP) — Blacks and Hispanics in the Boston area were denied mortgages more than twice as often as Whites, regardless of income, according to bank reports for 1991.

Bank data released last year for 1990 showed a similar lending gap between Blacks and Whites, with the trend most marked in the Greater Boston area. The annual bank reports are required under the federal Home Mortgage Disclosure Act.

"Some banks might be better, some worse, but overall the rejection ratio is still awful," said Richard Driscoll, the president of the Massachusetts Bankers Association. "It signifies that this is still a serious problem."

Among the findings of the new reports:

• Shawmut Mortgage Co. denied mortgages to well-paid Blacks twice as often as it did to low-income Whites. However Shawmut officials said the bank almost doubled the number of mortgages made to Blacks last year when compared to 1990, and was the top home lender in several largely Black neighborhoods of Boston.

• Bank of Boston Corp. officials said Blacks were rejected for mortgages roughly twice as often as Whites in 1991. Bank of Boston attracted mortgage applications from fewer Blacks last year than it did in 1990.

• BayBanks Inc. denied mortgages to Blacks and Hispanics nearly 2 1/2 times as often as to Whites in Boston. However BayBanks showed a 60 percent increase in the number of home loans made to Blacks from 1990 to 1991.

• The minority-owned Boston Bank of Commerce approved roughly seven out of 10 mortgage applications from Blacks and Whites alike. Hispanics had a higher re-

Luippold to head Public Safety
Longtime officer ready to tackle 'difficult issues'

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

Reaching for the stars with his many goals, the new director of Public Safety at the University of Massachusetts aims to minimize crime and make UMass police officers more "accessible" to students.

"Our expectations are very high," said John W. Luippold Jr., the 15-year veteran with the department.

Starting out at the Amherst police department 15 years ago as a community service officer, Luippold, who has served as chief of police, became the director in August. He succeeds his former boss, Arthur Hilson, who retired this summer.

Luippold will administer all departments in the Division of Public Safety including: the detective bureau, uniformed police, security, the community disorders unit, mounted patrol and escort services. He supervises clerical workers, an unarmed security force and 42 police officers.

Luippold also wants to expand upon the educational programs the department offers and the escort service, which he considers "very important."

Luippold said he is particularly proud to be promoted in a force he's been with for the past 15 years.

"I really feel we have one of the best departments in the area," said Luippold. "We have a fine group of individuals and a good training program."

He said the campus officers are often forgotten, especially competing with the Amherst department and the state force. In fact, he said the force currently has five openings due to officers transferring to other departments.

At UMass, an officer is required to go through basic training as well as computer training. Luippold said the officers are in a much more "complicated world" at the university than the city or state.

"We are a well-trained professional police department that goes hand in hand with being well-treated," said Luippold.

With a diverse University population, Luippold said the University offers a challenging environment which keeps his officers' hands full.

"There are so many difficult issues here," said Luippold. "There's a lot of complex issues other communities don't have to deal with in the same context."

"It's a very difficult and stressful situation. Our officers feel so stressful. It's a challenge, and some don't adjust," added Luippold.

But Luippold has confidence in his officers.

"I have no doubts that my officers do more than most cities and towns ever experience," said Luippold.

Students trek to Faneuil Hall for Clinton rally

By TAMI MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

Forty University of Massachusetts students travelled to Boston Friday to see and hear presidential candidate Bill Clinton, courtesy of University Democrats.

The group was able to obtain a few front-section tickets to the Faneuil Hall rally attended by approximately 45,000 people. The remainder of the student contingent was given tickets in the second section.

Clinton criticized Bush for his reluctance to debate, his credibility and the Iran/Contra issue, according to Neil Carpenter, president of University Democrats and Nathan Guerrero, treasurer of the group.

Carpenter and Guerrero said they see a lot of support at UMass for the Clinton/Gore ticket.

"Most people are fairly supportive," Guerrero said. "We grew up under Reagan and Bush. I hear people saying, 'I'd just like to see what it would be like to have a Democrat in the White House.'"

"There seems to be a lot of support from older students and students living in Central, Orchard Hill and Northeast," said Carpenter. "It's amazing how many people from Orchard Hill have signed up to help."

Carpenter said the organization's next project will be an absentee ballot drive. The group will be slipping applications for absentee ballots under doors so that students will have time to submit them and get their ballots.

Activities up to this point have included tabling, handing out information on Clinton and buttons.

Guerrero said the money is used for photocopying fliers and other operational expenses.

"Our biggest project will be 'Get Out the Vote,'" said

11-year-old grows up fast in war-torn Sarajevo

By MARK J. PORUBCANSKY
Associated Press

SARAJEVO Bosnia-Herzegovina — His is a face any mother would be proud of — a hint of freckles, alert brown eyes and a ready smile. But in war-torn Sarajevo, 11-year-old Timur Kekovic is growing up too fast.

A courier for the Bosnian defense forces, Timur packs a sawed-off shotgun. Shells ring his waist. A tear-gas pistol and wooden-handled knife are strapped to his side. He says he'd kill if he had to.

A Bosnian military spokeswoman, speaking on condition of anonymity, said she knew of no soldier younger than Timur, or of any policy barring children that age from joining up.

On Sunday, Timur laid his shotgun on a table in the library of his former school to tell his story.

He sleeps with his gun, he said. When he leaves the house for the day, his mother tells him to be careful.

Timur is proud. He's also very angry and confused.

When the first barricades went up in Sarajevo this spring, Timur's father took him out to help defend the city. His brothers, 20-year-old Aladin and 16-year-old Elvir, are on the front lines. Three months ago, Timur also took the oath.

The war has dragged on since then. Timur said he doesn't miss school much — he mostly liked only the music and sports, anyhow — but he would rather be at the seaside swimming.

Instead, clad in a khaki beret and green military jumpsuit, he scurries through the streets of Sarajevo to pass messages back and forth among the soldiers. Sometimes he has to dodge sniper fire.

Once, he got to within 50 yards of the enemy. "They were shelling our positions, and I was afraid, very afraid," he said. But after an hour and a half, he able to get out.

When he is not carrying messages, Timur answers the telephone or cleans weapons.

His school friends also help in the war effort, digging bunkers or carrying water or food for the soldiers. But they envy Timur.

"A lot of them are making pistols and guns like I have out of wood," he said.

Timur also had another school friend, Zoka Repic. "He was a good friend," Timur said, "Usually, when I didn't have money, he would buy me something."

But Zoka left with the Serbs who fled Sarajevo when the fighting started, and "now his father is on Mrkovici, sending us grenades," Timur said. Mrkovici is a Serb position north of Sarajevo.

Zoka called from another Serb-held town, Vogosca, a couple days ago.

"He asked me how it is here," Timur related. "I said it's fine, we're all shooting at each other."

Luippold

Even with budget cutbacks, Luippold said he is not having problems with staffing.

"We are doing more with less. We're being innovative," said Luippold.

Because Luippold feels strongly about being connected with students and being approachable, his officers are making an effort to get to know students better.

As part of that effort to be more connected, eight officers will begin a new program of bicycle patrols this year. Officers will be riding bicycles similar to mountain bikes.

The department already has a 4-year-old mounted police unit — five officers who patrol the campus by way of horse. Mounted police also ran drug education programs this summer in off-campus housing complexes.

"I think it's important to be connected. It's something I've always missed — walking around and meeting people," said Luippold.

The "alcohol factor"

One of his biggest safety concerns on campus is alcohol related behavior and injuries, Luippold said.

"A lot of physical and emotional injuries are related to the alcohol factor," said Luippold. "That concerns me."

He added that his preference is to inform people that problems could develop before they do occur.

"We have a responsible student population but criminal and disruptive behavior and some tragedies occur and we need to respond," said Luippold. "Students are at an age, 18-22, when they experiment. That's why enforcement and education is so important.

Luippold said with the newly enacted domestic violence law, his staff has been able to respond much better to violent and abusive physical relationships between people who date.

"We have a tool in our hands now," said Luippold.

Fifteen years of service

Luippold, 37, has been an officer at the University since 1977. He was promoted to sergeant in 1980, lieutenant in 1988, deputy chief in 1989, and chief in 1991. As a sergeant and lieutenant, he served as president of his unit of the International Brotherhood of Police Officers.

Luippold received his bachelor's degree in criminal justice from Westfield State College in 1979, and his master's degree in Public Administration from the University in 1988. In 1987, Luippold attended the New England Institute of Command Training at Babson College.

New districts cause lower voter turnout

AUBURN, Mass. (AP) — If half a dozen people vote in Precinct 1 in the 3rd Congressional District race next month, election officials will be happy with the turnout.

After all, there are only seven 3rd District registered voters in the precinct. Only two of them voted in the primary.

Auburn, like some other towns in Massachusetts, saw lines for new congressional districts cut through its boundaries because of redistricting. About 75 percent of the town is now in the 2nd District, while the remainder is in the 3rd District.

Most of Precinct 1 is in the 2nd District, leaving just seven registered voters eligible to vote for 3rd District candidates. All of them live on the same street, according to Town Clerk Doris Hill.

The two 3rd District voters who went to the Auburn Public Library for the Sept. 15 primary found a warden and three workers waiting to serve them, the Telegram & Gazette of Worcester reported.

The same number of workers will be on duty Nov. 3, hoping for a turnout by all seven registered voters.

"Maybe we'll have to hire another worker," Hill said. "In retrospect, this is funny. If I didn't laugh, I'd cry. The whole thing is just dumb, dumb, dumb."

Correction

Due to a computer error the Friday edition omitted the following references from the article "Asian feel stiffed by the University."

The proper heading should have stated "Cultural Diversity: An Asian Perspective." And in respect to (AASA) student representatives, the overall information put forth did cover the essence of organization in it's entirety. The (AASA) student organization also mentioned that the Administration can be more responsive to the needs of Asian and Asian American by revitalizing and expanding the Asian Studies Program. The student leaders also are committed to working with other student organizations to broaden its mission.

The Collegian regrets the error.

Food feedback

In a marked improvement from the vegetarian graffiti artist who scrawled "NO MORE CHICKEN" in front of the Franklin Dining Commons last spring, the D.C.'s now utilize a more effective way to listen to students opinions on D.C. food.

"Lemonade is too damn sweet," one student whines.

"Your comment will be passed along to the purchasing department. We currently are using a Coke product," responds Marion Whalen, manager of the Franklin Dining Commons.

She is one of five D.C. managers who write responses on the small comment card forms made available in all the D.C.'s. The cards, with both the student comment and official D.C. response, are then posted for all to see.

"It's a vehicle to communicate with the customer," says Whalen. "We pretty much take their suggestions very seriously."

"Could you guys please, by means of lights or signs, indicate which side of the D.C. to go to to (sic) drop off our trays — this would save a lot of aggravation," says Kevin.

"Signage is indeed a constant concern. We will continue to strive toward better signage," writes Whalen. This is a great idea — this could reduce annoying linage when waiting to dump off your trayage.

Whalen says all the comment cards are compiled and studied by D.C. officials. Apparently, they take this form of food feedback so seriously that they have divided the cards into four categories: negative, positive, a request, and a suggestion.

For this next one, I would make a special category: just plain dumb.

"Play Anthrax in the D.C.," writes Mark.

"Maybe someday but for right now — sorry!" politely responds Whalen.

Recent comment cards indicate that some students are extremely sensitive about their cereals — possibly to the point of neurosis.

"Why is it that there is always a decent selection from the grains group at Worcester D.C.? Why is it that we get stuck with mere flakes and raisins when they get the good stuff? I WANT REAL CEREAL!" writes Greg.

"Worcester D.C. serves the largest number of vegetarian students and offers a full compliment daily," writes Whalen.

Frosted flakes and the Cap'n just don't cut it, do they, Greg?

But not all students scrawl complaints on the comment cards. In fact, there seems to be a rising collective student movement to bring the heralded "Belgian waffles" back to the D.C.'s on a weekly basis.

"Can I pleeeease (sic), please, please, please have the old waffles back? They were really yummy !!" Wayne begs.

"They are on the menu [for last Saturday]. Make sure to come to brunch," advises assistant D.C. manager Martha Monaghan.

"Bring the big Belgian waffles back," says Tom and "What happened to the Belgian waffles?" questions Rebecca.

If I'm not mistaken, there will be a Belgian Waffle Rally on the Student Union steps sometime this week. Watch for it.

"Introduction to Monads"

Wishing you were back in that "Algebra IX" class studying theorems, axioms and postulates?

Well, the University of Massachusetts was a hotbed of mathematical brain-scratching this summer when several members of the math department participated in off-campus research activities.

Professor Hui Kuang Hsieh, as a guest of the Academia Sinica in Taipei, Taiwan, spoke on "Tolerance and prediction intervals for the lifetime of k-out-of-m-systems." Neat.

In addition, Professor Haskell Cohen spent his summer on the mathematics faculty of the Center for Talented Youth — a program that selects outstanding high schoolers and brings them to several campuses, where they receive a strong dose of the humanities, sciences and mathematics.

SGA changes election date

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

Are you tired of the never-ending presidential race? Looking for more excitment in political campaigns?

It is time for the Student Government Association to hold its annual elections to fill empty offices and seats in the area governments, house councils and Student Senate.

Jon Aronson, chair of governmental affairs, said the SGA pushed the election day back to Oct. 6. Also, the SGA reopened the nomination period to give more students in certain residence halls an opportunity to get their name on the ballot.

The previous election date of Sept. 29 was the earliest in about seven years, said Aronson.

"The interested students didn't have enough time to settle in and they were speculative about getting involved in student government," said Aronson, a junior political science major.

He said the extra time will significantly increase the number of nomination papers filed.

"When the nomination period ended last week, we had 35 nomination papers for Student Senate," said Aronson, "but about 15 more people with papers walked in after the deadline."

Aronson said one problem the student government is having is many students were hesitant about participating in the competitive races.

"They are afraid of getting involved in a heated competition and having to do more campaigning," he said.

"Students didn't have enough time to settle in and they were speculative about getting involved"
– Jon Aronson, governmental affairs

He said the SGA decided not to allow more students on the ballot in already contested spots.

"The SGA has to figure out a way to be fair to the students who took the time to do the nomination papers before hand."

In addition, Aronson said there is supposed to be one student senator for every 250 students in a residence hall.

"The senator serves as an advocate for the students," said Aronson.

Aronson said the senate forms five subcommittees which consist of finances, budgets, public affairs, public policy and academic affairs.

He said many residence halls will be reopening their nomination periods. If students wish to receive specific information concerning the elections, call the SGA at 545-0341.

Students celebrate New Year

Rosh Hashana unites UMass Jewish community

JENNIFER L. PRESS
Collegian Correspondent

Fall may mean the start of a new semester for most people but for about 4,000 students at the University of Massachusetts, it means the start of the Jewish New Year, Rosh Hashana.

Rosh Hashana or "Head of the New Year" celebrates the first day the world was created. For Jews, it is a time to reflect on the past year while looking ahead to the future.

Rabbi Saul Perlmutter, director of University of Massachusetts' Hillel House, said Rosh Hashana is not simply a day to look at the past year but a day to look ahead and go into new directions for the coming year.

"Rosh Hashana is a time for Jewish people to be recreated and renewed," Perlmutter explained.

Perlmutter said attending services is a way to bring the entire Jewish community together in order to give support to one another as they try to make positive changes in their lives.

"Services give students the spiritual opportunity to step away from daily life and the pressures of academics and look at their lives," Perlmutter said.

While many students are headed home for the High Holy Days, services will also be held at UMass.

Josh Slomich, the student president of Hillel House, said the yearly services on campus provide a good substitution when you cannot go home for the holidays.

"Attending services are important because they give you an opportunity to relate to God and start over again," he said.

Slomich said he likes the services here because they are geared toward the students.

Perlmutter also said the services held at the University are a prime opportunity for students to participate.

"Many of the [singers] at the services are students, often participating in a religious service for the very first time," Perlmutter said. "It's wonderful to work with them."

In a statement from the American Jewish Committee, Nobel Peace Prize Laureate Elie Wiesel said this is a time for every Jew to explore their heritage.

"I still believe that to be Jewish means to seek fulfilment both as a Jew and as a human being. For a Jew, Judaism and humanity must go together."

"To be Jewish is, above all, to safeguard memory and open its gates to the celebration of life as well as the suffering, to the song of ecstasy as well as the tears of distress that are our legacy as Jews."

Rosh Hashana services is to be held today at 10 a.m. and 7 p.m. and tomorrow morning at 10 in the Student Union Ballroom. They are free and open to the public.

Nursing students win national award

A group of University of Massachusetts nursing students recently won a national award for a video they produced on the hazards of drunk driving.

The 15-minute video entitled "Think Before You Drink" was awarded the "Best Community Health Project" at the National Student Nurses Association's annual convention, held in Phoenix last April.

The video is intended to be used as a teaching tool for high school students, according to the producers, because alcohol abuse is "so common among young people."

The topics in the video mostly focus on the effects of alcohol on relationships and the importance of maintaining one's self-esteem despite peer pressure.

"We are making an effort in reaching young audiences who are just beginning to make their own choices in life, and trying to warn them about the consequences of the use of alcohol can have on them," said Eleanor Vanetzian, assistant nursing professor.

The video was produced as an honors project for the course "Prevention and Management of Illness," taught by Professor Vanetzian.

In the honors course, the students studied about adults in the end stages of liver disease caused by long-term alcohol use. The subject gave the nursing students the idea of making the film on the dangers of drinking and driving and submitting it to the contest.

Credit was given to the video's clever use of statistics about alcohol abuse and alcoholism, and also for the use of personal stories, told by the nurses themselves about their experiences with alcohol.

This more sensible approach is said to be a change from typical large company, drunk driving videos which tend to be more graphic and difficult for many students to watch. Already one school system in Montauge, Mass. has expressed an interest in the video.

Professor Vanetzian said she is unsure of what sorts of projects she is going to work on or even whether their is going to be another video made this year.

Although it talks about drunk driving, the video was inspired and dedicated to Nancy Anton, a 20-year-old nursing student at the University who was killed last year in a non-alcohol-related traffic accident.

All proceeds from the copies of the videos sold will benefit the Nancy Anton Scholarship Fund.

Guerrero said the group's activities help students become part of the process.

"A lot of students feel ignored by the process," he said.

Carpenter and Guerrero said they are negotiating a possible debate between Carpenter and the president of the Republican Club, which would be sponsored by the Debate Union.

UMass students were also involved in a fundraiser which resulted in a Democratic headquarters on 479 West Street in Amherst.

Time to stop passing the destructive heirloom of hatred

A long time ago when I lived in Brooklyn I had a friend named Malik. Malik was Black and I was White, but nobody ever told us we were different, so being best friends didn't seem strange.

One day we went to the Central Park Zoo. Our two mothers sat on a bench and chatted, and Malik and I ran around, picking up bottlecaps and twigs and carefully stacking them into little "treasure" piles. We were sitting at the base of a tree counting our treasures when two older Black boys came near us and taunted Malik, making fun of him for playing with a "Whitie," and a girl at that. He started crying, but I didn't even understand what they were saying. Our mothers came over and told the boys to leave us alone, but that wouldn't be the last time he was taunted.

I don't really remember later incidents as well (and only with the help of my mother could I get details about Central Park), but I do remember one day we just got on a crosstown bus and tried to run away. We couldn't understand why or how we were so different that we couldn't be friends. Mom called it "a shame," and told us not to pay attention to the older kids. I never realized that I was witnessing the passing along of a tradition of hate.

There had never been a problem with Malik's and my friendship until someone told us it was wrong. We didn't see any real differences between us, except maybe favorite ice cream flavors, until someone took the time to point out, "you're different, you can't play together."

I eventually moved to New Jersey and I haven't seen him since, but I can imagine what it would be like if I saw him today.

If he went to UMass, it would pretty much be politically impossible for us to be good friends. He might get called, as I once overheard, amazed, last semester, an Oreo: "Black on the outside and White on the inside." If I invited Malik over to shoot the breeze, maybe my neighbors would ask me if he were my "token" Black friend, my political "affirmative action" friendship. Maybe if he was with his friends and I sat down near him they might, as I witnessed earlier this semester, pull their chairs away and say "honkie" under their breath.

Brooke C.
WHEELER

The thing that angers me the most is that this is learned behavior. People are not born with hate and distrust; it is passed down from generation to generation like a destructive heirloom. While we scorn our parents' generation for their ignorance and bitter resentment, we turn right around and re-teach it to each other. The Black author Wendell Barry knew this; he made a plea to end this tradition of hate in The Hidden Wound.

Where do people learn terms like "banana," "Oreo," "apple," etc. (yellow/black/red on the outside, white on the inside)? I overheard it from a fellow classmate. He probably learned it from another classmate. And so it continues.

Our generation should not be enemies; we should not hate each other because of what the generations before us have taught. We have the chance to change the message from hostility to peace. We should be alliances against the kind of hate we disparage. We should be fighting together against the racism that precedes us instead of fighting against each other and fostering a new generation of racism.

Martin Luther King Jr. knew that violence and hate brings nothing but more pain and pulls us farther away from the ultimate goal: unity, equality, harmony and peace. He said, "An eye for an eye leaves everybody blind." And slowing we are becoming blind at the hands of one another.

Is there no end? We all ask, "Why can't there be peace?" but then let our brothers and sisters remind us, "Never. That can never happen." When is the tradition going to change, and instead of passing along hate we pass along understanding and peace? Those that teach distrust and hate are as bad as drug dealers; they are trying to sell you something harmful and destructive. They don't want you to think there can be an alternative — then they'd be out of business.

Hate is debilitating; it drains you and insures that you will never be happy. Distrust is tiring and takes effort to keep up. Peace brings productivity and positive change. On the other hand, some people believe that when violence talks, people listen. Unfortunately this is true because the din of violence drowns out everything else around it, including hope.

How is it ever going to change? How is the tradition of racism ever going to stop? The change has to start inside yourself. Ask yourself: do you want to hate for the rest of your life, or do you want to get an early start on peace? Are you going to teach the rest of your brothers and sisters to hate as others have taught you? Will you raise your children to hate?

If your answer is yes, then you have just insured the perpetuation of misery, distrust, fear and hate for generations to come.

George Bush is 'grand deceiver'

All real Americans will understand, thank and forget Pat Buchanan until 1996. George Bush is back on the GOP ticket. For what? Was the question asked by every true conservative after his nomination. Traditional conservative Republicans realize Bush's betrayal of them on such issues as taxes and racial quotas are not mere aberrations. His contemptuous attitude and recent betrayals are not a new phenomenon but are symptomatic. They reflect George Bush's long-documented hostility to conservatism, hidden behind a facade of studied pretense of loyalty when he served as vice-president under Reagan.

I credit my exposure of Bush to Richard Viguerie and Steven Allen, chairman and communications director of United Conservatives of America, respectively, for summarizing the Grand Deceiver's record in the December, 1991 issue of Newsday.

Bush blamed "right-wingers" for costing him votes in the 1964 U.S. Senate race. As a congressman, he called for a tax increase. He voted for gun control. He voted for the Family Assistance Plan that would have inflated the welfare rolls. As a presidential candidate in 1980, Bush said it is "impossible to stop the growth of the government." He attacked Reagan as an "extremist." He supported federal funding of abortion. He called supply-side economic theories "voodoo economics." As vice-president, he called conservative activists "all hat and no cattle." As president, after having pledged, "Read my lips: no new taxes," he raised taxes to the highest level in history. He supported Clean Air Act revisions that restrain industrial progress and harm job production. He voted for the discriminatory racial quota bill.

He endorsed Congress' grab for a massive pay raise and forbade his party's candidates from making raises an issue. He allowed the National Endowment for the Arts to fund pornography. He seeks favored nation trade status for the Butchers of Beijing. He backed the "wrong horse" throughout last year's dramatic events in the Soviet Union, unrealistically supporting Mikhail Gorbachev against democratic reformers. He ridiculed Boris Yeltsin. He snubbed the soon-to-be-chosen (first and last in the Soviet history) president of Russia on his visit to Washington. He has sought to purge his administration of Reaganites, cocksure that conservative voters have "no place to go."

Why say no to George Bush, coming Nov. 3, 1992? "Grassroots conservatives, who provide the GOP with the bulk of its ideas, its issues, its money and its volunteers, no longer feel they have a stake in the Bush administration.

"Without Pat Buchanan in the '92 race, conservatives would [have to] sit on the sidelines as a pseudo-conservative Klansman [Bill Clinton], a country club Republican president and six or seven liberal Democrats debate the issues and set the agenda." To conservatives, Judas Bush is the Grand Deceiver. True conservatives should write in votes for conservative alternatives, like Howard Phillips of United States Tax-Payers party, and even Pat Buchanan. God Bless America.

Upward Bound unjustice shows lack of conscience

The sordid information about the Upward Bound program would make a good talk show. In fact, it would make an excellent Hollywood film. We could call it "A University Scandal."

There has been tampering with United States mail, mismanagement of federal funds, computer theft, incompetent grant proposal writing and withholding of information from the University community.

The Upward Bound program, a college preparatory program for first generation high school and low income students, was defunded last spring.

Malkes
GOMES

It is too late for particular administrators at the University to say they did not know anything. Someone knows something and it is only a matter of time before the brick wall falls.

Of course, no one will voluntarily admit to having been involved with a conspiracy to sabotage a program which pushed students upward but suddenly started reversing students backward because the adults who are supposed to be their role models abandoned them. The administrators who were involved with such a crime have displayed a great deal of selfishness, catering to their own needs. They have done an excellent job of playing bureaucrats.

Hopefully their consciences are telling them that they have abrogated a very reputable program after 25 years of outstanding accomplishment.

They have made a fiasco out of something which served many of my "brothers" and "sisters" in the ALANA community, as well as many European students. To pacify their guilt, they advocate starting an entirely different program.

But what about the 25 years of Upward Bound? What about the students who utilized the program and those who built the program? Their diligent work has been belittled. In fact, Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin is very avid about working with someone else to structure a different program.

How ironic, especially when the administration repudiated the idea that the Upward Bound staff help write this year's grant proposal to refund the program for another three year cycle. They have eschewed a very important issue in all of this, which is ethics.

Imagine being an employee for the Upward Bound program and hearing, by accident, through a phone call with a friend, that your program was defunded. This is news which the University should have promulgated, not a social phone call with a friend. It is like saying to the employees: thank you dogs for doing your job, but your services are no longer needed. It was the employees of the program who had direct contact with the students — not the administration. They made the difference.

Imagine being a student in this program and suddenly being told three days before the program would end that there would be no more program. How would you feel?

Obviously the administrators did not feel anything but antipathy.

In fact, over the three years I have been associated with the program, I have rarely seen an administrator come from Whitmore and make contact with the students, except for one interim director who visited a few times just to check up on staff — not to associate with students. Basically, they have been unaware of the program.

When uninformed about something, most people do one of two things: they educate themselves or remain ignorant to the reality of a situation.

It is very easy for many of the administrators of this school to arrive at work each day with their degrees and nice clothing and pick up their paychecks on Friday, remaining distant from the student population and the daily life situations on campus. Then they wonder in amazement why students are always protesting and taking over buildings on campus.

It is time the administration recognizes the legitimacy of programs such as Upward Bound and stops paying lip service to this quote unquote multicultural hogwash which the administration claims so avidly to support. If the administration really supported multiculturalism then maybe the program would still be here today.

In 1989, the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Blacks and other Minority Students had their summer program cut, and the minority engineering program for incoming freshmen has been scaled down.

What will go next? Is there a conspiracy to eliminate these support programs? We will discuss what you as a student can do about the situation of the Upward Bound Program next time.

Words & Pictures III: Milk and Cheese

By KIP MANLEY
Collegian Correspondent

Milk & Cheese
Evan Dorkin
Slave Labor Graphics

Before we get started, I would like offer an apology, as last week's column was inadvertantly cut and an important point was therefore lost. As you may or may not recall, last week I covered the various comics stores in the Valley, and I seemed to end by telling you that due to a combination of Sturgeon's and Gresham's Laws — that is, that 90 percent of Everything is S— and that the Bad S— will Always Drive out the Good.

But — and this is a big but — difficult does not mean impossible. The staff of all three of the stores that I covered last week: Crossroads, Lance's and the Same Bat Channel said to me that if a comic is out there somewhere, still in print, they can get it for you, though it might take a little time.

The point here is that if you can't find it, ask. Everyone I talked to at all three stores was friendly and articulate and they don't bite. They care about comics as a medium and an artform, not just as a facet of the entertainment industry.

So. This week I was going to tell you all about a comic that would enrich your soul, a comic so good that reading it would clear up your acne, make you a better lover and generally leave you feeling at one with the universe. But I'm in a mean and sour mood so I decided to do Evan Dorkin's Milk & Cheese instead.

What are Milk and Cheese? Well, basically, they are a small pint-sized carton of milk much like you used to get in grade school and a small wedge of anonymous though pungent cheese, that have been given cute little arms and legs and cute little faces vaguely reminiscent of Dick Tracy on a Halcion overdose. They are connoisseurs of bad alcohol and worse television, vicious critics of popular culture, black belts in the use of random violence and the menacing non sequitur. They are, to use their own words, a "carton of hate" and a "wedge of spite."

They appear in three comics — Milk & Cheese Number One, Milk & Cheese's Other Number One, and Milk & Cheese's Third Number One — that are basically compilations of one, two, or three page strips that have appeared in various sources, such as indie magazines like Deadline and X or backing up comics like Cerebus or Dorkin's own Pirate Corps. The strips aren't meant to be read in a single sitting, although there's no rule against it. There's no continuity, though. Each one is basically yet another of Milk and Cheese's outings to destroy that which they hate, which is everything, preferably with copious amounts of violence and a healthy leavening of cruel asides. They reach new heights in the art of the use of unnecessary force.

Excerpts from "Milk & Cheese" COMICS BY EVAN DORKIN

And that's pretty much it. Evan Dorkin has proven himself in other comics, most notably his excellent Pirate Corps, to be a writer of some compassion and decency, but he brings none of that to bear here. We are left with nothing but his merciless wit and an encyclopedic knowledge of pop culture that provides his dairy alter egos with a steady stream of more than deserving targets.

There are no attempts at justifying this rampant nihilism. There are no quiet moments at home with these two, no tender scenes to show us the cute side of their relationship, like with Calvin and Hobbes, Ren and Stimpy or Akbar and Jeff. Hell, there's barely a relationship at all between Milk and Cheese. The only reason there's two of them is that it's more fun to bash things with someone who agrees with you and it's easier to do witty dialogue if there's someone to talk to.

I could lie and tell you that it's really all about the catharsis one feels upon reading these strips, identifying with our pasteurized protagonists as they wittily destroy such all-pervading evils as stupid mall clerks, hippy wannabees and the war on drugs, allowing us to face the world once more, refreshed and cleansed — but I won't. That's just rationalization. Let's face it. Sometimes there's just nothing funnier than cruel nonsensical mayhem and nobody does it better than Milk and Cheese.

So get out there and buy it, damn it. These guys aren't just fooling around. I want to see you all wearing Milk and Cheese T shirts, I want to see you all playing No Talent Celebrity Tag, I want to see the strip called "Milk and Cheese Vomit" framed above the toilet of everyone who likes to drink far too much on a regular basis. You want icons for the Nineties? Here they are.

We deserve no less.

Billy Crystal as Buddy Young Jr. in "Mr. Saturday Night"

Mr. Lupo goes head to head with Mr. Sat Nite

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Schmaltz. It is possibly the only word to describe Billy Crystal's motion picture directorial debut, Mr. Saturday Night. This sometimes biting yet mostly gooey comedy does a better job of trying to make us laugh than trying to pull at our heartstrings.

Mr. Saturday Night tells the story of Buddy Young Jr. (Crystal), a Jewish comic who never really made it big. The film flashes back over Young's 50 year long career while showing us Young today; a bitter old man who alienates his wife (Doc Hollywood's Julie Warner), his new manager (Helen Hunt) and most of all his manager-brother (a great performance by City Slickers' David Paymer).

While the humor is well-played and engaging, Mr. Saturday Night falters when it tries to be "touching." Co-written by Crystal, Babaloo Mandell and Lowell Ganz, the duo who wrote the drippy and overrated A League of Their Own, the film pushes the envelope when it comes to drowning in sentiment. The devices are overused and predictable.

What saves Mr. Saturday Night from being a total mush-fest is the fact that Billy Crystal is so likable, he'd make Hitler into a nice guy. His performance is engaging it makes the price of admission worth it. Kudos also go to the makeup designer who does a credible job of making the characters age; this isn't For the Boys (thank goodness). Don't go with big expectations and you won't be disappointed.

Grade: B

The Last of the Mohicans — There is something very wrong about this film. . . there aren't any characters. Instead, there are familiar bodies romping through the wilderness. Such is the almost fatal flaw of Mohicans, an otherwise visually stunning and mostly enjoyable scalping-fest.

Mohicans, from director Michael Mann (creator of TV's "Miami Vice"), is as erratic as films come. On the one hand, the adventure is thrilling and complex (if only in a plot-device ridden way) and on the other, it's completely hollow. The film's brutal and realistic fight scenes culminate almost always with a thwak! of the tomahawk; a sight that's achingly gruesome and historically true. These action pieces, complete with searing brutality, almost win you over. The scenes are as emotionally draining as they are cooly stylized.

However, no matter how you look at it, there is a gaping whole in characterization. Oscar winner Daniel Day-Lewis (My Left Foot) portrays Hawkeye, a man who was adopted and raised by a Mohican chief. The audience who is unfamiliar to the classic novel by James Fenimore Cooper, will be left wanting some background on this event. As it is portrayed here, it feels like this happens every day.

Hawkeye is drawn into a French-English skirmish set in the pre-Revolutionary colonies. Each side has formed loose alliances with Indian tribes. With twisting loyalties and vengeful rogues, most of Mohicans is a history lesson come alive. But as the plot wheels turn and everything is rushed to a tense (yet yeah-right) clifftop conclusion, history remains set in clouded figures.

The most potent character, a revenge-minded Huron Indian named Magua (Dances With Wolves' Wes Studi), is pure villainy. Yet once again, Mohicans cheats on its characters, giving the audience rough sketches instead of flesh and blood.

Despite the fact that Hawkeye is almost non-existent as an identity, the invented romance between him and the daughter of a British leader, Cora (Unlawful Entry's Madeleine Stowe) further strains the film's center. After a brief meeting and a night of rolling in the leaves, they are inexplicably and unbelievably ready to die for each other. Now, I'm a hopeless romantic, but this coupling rang too false.

This is indicative of the film's thunderous flaw: there seems to be a missing reel. The reel must contain something deeper in a character besides his or her name, at least one or two more scenes giving some weight to Hawkeye and Cora's "romance" and some overall fleshing out. As it stands, Mohicans feels like an epic-lite.

Michael Mann has crafted a superior example of pure visceral style over substance. His Mohicans' has rich, textured shots of forest vistas, graceful Indians almost flying through the trees, a haunting and stunning waterfall sequence and some of the most powerful and in-your-face battle scenes in recent memory.

Mann's visual artistry, however, cannot wholly rescue Mohicans from its empty center. Especially at the conclusion, when people start dropping like flies, their motivations seem compulsory, as if filling out their plot-driven destinies. The Last of the Mohicans can be easily overrated, its eye-popping visuals can just about smother the one-dimensional characterizations. Beyond simple eye-candy, Mohicans fails to deliver a solid whole.

The Connells: an alternative act on the rise

By ERIC POULIN
Collegian Staff

If you're amongst the many who've been anxiously awaiting the release of a new album by the Connnells, I wouldn't suggest that you hold your breath for an extended period of time.

The band's lawsuit against their previous record company, TVT records should cause a further delay in the issuing of an already long-overdue follow-up to their 1990 breakthrough release, One Simple Word.

The Connells allege that TVT failed to properly promote the band's prior albums and did not pay artist royalties within a preferred amount of time. The band is currently searching for a new recording label.

In the meantime, if you're just chomping at the bit to hear some of their new material, The Connells will be playing a free show this evening, thanks to our good friends over at Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton.

Joining them will be Washington D.C. singer/songwriter extraordinaire Tommy Keene and the heroes of Hopkins Academy, Love Minus Zero.

Although The Connells have been touring constantly for about a year and a half, there's a pretty good chance that this will be our last opportunity to hear their new batch of songs before they go to wax. In addition to the new work, it's a pretty safe bet that they'll be diving into tracks from their Alternative-Top 5 smash One Simple World.

One of 1990s biggest independent releases, One Simple World is classic Connells power-chord rock, yet with seemingly more depth. The band credits producer Hugh Jones (of Echo and the Bunnymen fame) in bringing more out of their songs than they had believed to be possible.

"Hugh stressed performance," says lead guitarist Mike Connell. "He put in 15 or more hours a day producing, recording, and engineering, and his ability to give the songs dimensions and life impressed us."

The Connells are further testimony to the growing adage that the southern states are a new haven for alternative rock. They are a band on the rise and are most certainly worth checking out.

WOCH to hold first meeting this evening

By ERIC T. NELSON
Collegian Correspondent

The chance to be a hard talkin', rebel bandit of the airwaves has arrived. It awaits all who seek and is sitting on top of our very own Orchard Hill. WOCH, Orchard Hill Radio, will begin broadcasting sometime in the coming week.

WOCH was founded roughly six years ago by a group of radio enthusiasts from Orchard Hill. Tragically, its life was a short one that was quickly quashed by the governmental baddies from the Federal Communications Commission.

WOCH's reincarnation came in the form of Housing Services Cable Network in the fall of 1991. Broadcasting through the University's cable network means that they are no longer under the rules and regulation of the FCC. They are currently alive and well on channel 13 of your television.

WOCH is made up of a governing board of eight people, responsible for the various facets of running the station and lots of disc jockeys. They broadcast every day from nine a.m. until three in the morning and are looking to play a wide variety of music.

"It's really like a soap box in a way," is how J. LaPorte describes the station, referring to the fact that it is open to anyone who wants to be on the air. He is WOCH's program director and takes a very active hand in the running of the station. According to LaPorte, one of the biggest issues at the station is censorship.

Because WOCH is not subject to FCC regulations, its DJ's are free to be who they are and do what they want. "You don't have to worry about what you are going to play, because no one is going to come down on you," said LaPorte.

WOCH is a non-profit radio station, subsisting off of the generosity of record companies. "The fact that we are commercial free also adds to our uniqueness," added LaPorte.

WOCH is looking for a large number of new DJs for this semester. All who are interested can come to the first general meeting this evening at 7 p.m., held in the classroom of Grayson Hall in Orchard Hill.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Conferences with executives should turn out well. You are able to reach an amicable agreement without much trouble. Avoid getting stuck with handling minor details.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Work may pile up faster than you can handle it, putting your nervous system under considerable stress. Have lunch alone. Trust your intuition over logical arguments.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Let your imagination have free rein this morning. Be creative! Do not fall prey to the many smooth voices that will be around. Stop living by the clock. Spontaneity is a big asset.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Change is in the air. Several surprising incidents are on the agenda. Keep a low profile in both business and romance. Choose your confidants with special care tonight.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Not a good day for seeking favors. Wait until the time is right. Recycling a clever idea or project helps you reap new profits. Share the applause with the deserving. Look both ways when crossing the street today.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Both sympathy and favors are yours for the asking. Friends will come to your aid, offering helpful advice. Do not count on much work being accomplished. Eat some eggs today..

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Keep a restless or impulsive mood in check or you could squander a golden opportunity to advance your career. Elimination essential purchases and streamline your budget.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Good cheer abounds - but so do irresponsibility and extravagance. Leave your credit cards at home. Your love life is everything you expected. Fate determines the outcome of a decision.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Your plans seem to change from one moment to the next. Be flexible. Some good news regarding your job or health is coming your way. Relax with your mate tonight.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Financial matters are in the spotlight. Make an effort to increase your income. Expert advice is worth the expense. Welcome a last-minute social invitation.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Be careful to whom you express your feelings. Reflect on your motives. Although your romantic prospects are bright, there are some emotional cross currents present.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Something big and important is about to happen. Although you parents want to help, you may find they are getting in your way. Be gracious, but firm about your need for independence.

Minutewomen remain perfect with 2 wins

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The No. 5 ranked University of Massachusetts field hockey team took a huge step forward on the road this past weekend, defeating archrival Temple 1-0 on Friday and weathering a downpour Sunday to roll past Rutgers 3-0.

Massachusetts, who came into Philadelphia with memories of a bitter 1-0 loss to the Owls there in last season's Atlantic 10 Championship game, were able to avenge their loss with an Ainslee Press penalty stroke goal and tough defense in the 1-0 win.

"The team had a lot of apprehension going into Temple, but we played our game. We passed the ball well and played with confidence," UMass head coach Pam Hixon said.

The wins proved three things: first, that the team can win on the road. UMass plays six of their last ten games on the road, so the experience of the two wins will help them down the line.

Secondly, the wins prove that the team can win on artificial turf. The Minutewomen have a team more customed to natural grass, their home surface, but the victories over the Owls and Lady Knights help prepare UMass for the postseason, which is predominantly played on turf.

Thirdly, and most importantly, the wins give the Minutewomen a leg up on their fiercest Atlantic 10 rivals, both psychologically and in the standings.

"Our experience helped us and the wins were a huge confidence boost for the team, especially because they were on the road and on turf," Hixon said.

On Sunday, the Minutewomen (8-0) battled both the Lady Knights (3-5-1) and a ferocious rainstorm to post their eighth in a row, getting two goals from Tara Jelley to win 3-0.

"Rutgers came out swarming, and it was like nothing we had seen before," said Hixon. "They were fairly dangerous, but once we figured out what they were doing, we had no problem."

Massachusetts got things started late in the first half when Press scored on a penalty stroke with 7:11 left. Jelley gave the Minutewomen a 2-0 lead going into halftime when she scored with 3:47 remaining.

Jelley's second goal less than ten minutes into the second half killed any chances of a comeback for Rutgers.

Buffalo destroys N.E.

Bills embarrass Patriots in 41-7 win

By HOWARD ULMAN
Associated Press

FOXBORO — Jim Kelly showed the powerless New England Patriots what offense is all about Sunday.

The NFL's top passer for the league's highest-scoring team threw three touchdown passes in a 35-point second half, and the Buffalo Bills posted their second straight rout with a 41-7 win Sunday.

The Bills' bid for the first consecutive shutouts in the club's 33-year history ended when Hugh Millen's 4-yard pass to Marv Cook with 8:41 left in the game made the score 41-7.

Buffalo (4-0) crushed Indianapolis 38-0 a week earlier and has outscored opponents 153-45.

The Patriots (0-3) have only two touchdowns this year and three in their last five games. They have been outscored 65-13.

The Bills managed only field goals of 42 and 30 yards from Steve Christie in the first half.

But on their first three series of the third quarter, they scored on Kelly's scoring passes of 29 yards to James Lofton and 45 yards to Andre Reed and on Thurman Thomas' seventh touchdown of the year, a 1-yard run.

Buffalo made the score 41-0 on Kelly's 22-yard pass to Lofton with 13:47 left and Mike Lodish's 18-yard fumble return 44 seconds later.

Thomas finished with 120 yards on 18 carries, while Kelly completed 15 of 20 passes for 308 yards. Reed had nine catches for 168 yards and Lofton four for 113.

Millen completed his first 14 passes, 13 in the first half, but the Patriots didn't get inside the Buffalo 20 until the fourth quarter, the first time this season they have started a play that close to the goal line.

Kelly, who has thrown touchdown passes in 13 straight games, went to work in the third quarter.

He capped an 85-yard drive with his first scoring throw to Lofton at 3:55 of the third quarter and a 75-yard march with his pass to Reed at 12:13 of the period.

Mark Kelso's fourth-quarter interception started a 41-yards drive that ended with Lofton's 71st career touchdown catch.

The Patriots wasted numerous opportunities.

They had the ball for nine plays on their first series but punted from the Buffalo 41. On their third series, they moved from their 9 to a fourth-and-1 at the Buffalo 25. But Leonard Russell was stopped for no gain.

The Minutemen built on their halftime lead six minutes into the third quarter, as fullback Mike George barreled up the middle for three yards and a 23-7 UMass lead.

After a Walter Norton to Scott Mallory scoring strike cut the UMass lead to eight, the Minutemen doubled up on the Terriers on a McNeilly to Matt Stefanski five-yard touchdown pass with 11 minutes left, ending the UMass scoring.

BU would add two late scores to close within two, but a two-point conversion try with six minutes left fell short, effectively ending the Terriers chances.

The Terriers had a chance to get the ball back with just over two minutes left, but couldn't stop the Minutemen on second and long, as Ingoglia ran for a gain of 11, allowing the Minutemen to run out the clock from there.

Amherst College, with Yarworth sitting his top seven players. Later in the morning was a 22-9 victory over Queens College, a game that the referees totally let get away, ending in a fourth quarter when there were more than a few underwater jabs thrown by both teams.

Yesterday the Minutemen jumped all over M.I.T., going up 8-0 in a first period where the team committed zero turnovers. The final was 13-3. The afternoon game was a sloppy 14-6 win over Yale, in which the Minutemen were down 3-1 before they scored the game's next ten goals.

"It'll be nice to go home and watch football instead of playing polo on a Sunday afternoon," McOsker said.

THE FIVE COLLEGE WOMEN'S STUDIES RESEARCH CENTER WELCOMES STUDENTS

The Center - located in Dickinson House on the Mount Holyoke campus - sponsors a diverse program of lectures, films, and informal talks on feminist topics. Visiting scholars and activists from all over the world are in residence each semester pursuing their research and working collaboratively with Five College faculty. Colloquia and works-in-progress talks - held almost every week throughout the year - allow students to hear about current research in women's studies and meet leading scholars in the field. Water polo sinks 'Classic' competition

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

The term 'classic', as in the University of Massachusetts water polo team hosting of the "Fall Classic" at Amherst College this past weekend, connotates "epic athletic struggles where neither team should lose." Or something like that.

'Classic' in the sense of what happened down the road meant, "become non-appreciative hosts by turning each game into a non-competitive scrimmage."

The five games the 14th ranked UMass polo team, now 12-1, played, meant little more than that as they outscored their five opponents 79-27.

"We played well," said senior co-captain Dan McOsker. "Everybody got to play and that keeps everybody involved in practice."

The only problem the team encountered was the occasional lapse of intensity as they played teams that were visibly less-talented.

"We had an up and down weekend," said UMass coach Russ Yarworth, "but you have to realize that the level of competition wasn't too strong. When they had to play well, they did.

"I'm pretty pleased with how we played defensively. Offensively we still have a tendency to turn the ball over. The counter-attack was working well, but we didn't have much of a chance to run set offenses. You can bet we'll be working on that in practice this week."

The premier match-up of the event was to be Saturday night's prime-time match-up of UMass and Boston College, but it was no contest from the start as the Minutemen went up 3-0 after one period on goals by Tsan Engin, Dan McOsker and Engin again. More importantly, the defense didn't allow the Eagles a single shot on goal in that time.

B.C. scored to open the second period, but after some not-so-gentle defensive pointers from Yarworth, five different players scored before the period ended, making it 8-3.

The Eagles seemed to think that the way to beat UMass was to spread out the offense, but it backfired as UMass' aggressive defense closed the passing lanes and came up with numerous steals.

The final score, in front of a decent and loud crowd consisting largely of UMass swimmers and divers, was 16-3. In order to avoid running up the score Yarworth ordered his troops not to shoot in the fourth period.

It wasn't the firsttime he spared the opponents a more serious slaughter during the weekend.

Saturday morning's first game was a 15-6 win over

Women stay hot, win 2-1

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Neither sleet nor cold nor New Hampshire shall keep the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team from walking up another victory.

The Minutewomen (7-0) had to battle a tough Wildcat team as well as some weather not fit for soccer in order to remain undefeated by beating New Hampshire 2-1 on Saturday.

"It was the first rain game of the year for us and it definitely affected our play," Massachusetts coach Jim Rudy said. "But with this team I am pretty confident they can win under any condition."

It was freshman forward Nicole Roberts goal in the 68th minute which proved to be the game winner for Massachusetts. UMass' Carrie Koeper sent a ball into the goal box from about 40 yards out. UMass' Polly Hackathorn and a New Hampshire defender both leapt for the ball and it was knocked down to a waiting Roberts.

From there Roberts made no mistakes in firing the ball to the right of Wildcat goalkeeper Racheal Hansen.

"It was nice to see a freshman get the winner," Rudy said. "It was really a great play by Chief [Koeper] to get it in there. She read the play beautifully."

Roberts tally put the Minutewomen up 2-0 but New Hampshire cut the lead in half just 20 seconds later.

New Hampshire's Valentina Avramovic gained possession near midfield on the right flank. She proceeded to drive towards the net where she was left alone and allowed to tee it up just 15 yards out. Aramovic sent a bullet off of UMass keeper Briana Scurry's hands and into upper right corner.

"I was very pleased to see us come back like that," New Hampshire coach Marjorie Anderson said. "It showed the character of my team."

Massachusetts' first goal of the game was scored by New Hampshire defender Katie Gatto. Confused? So was Gatto when she tried to play the ball back to Hansen but ended up driving it into her own net to give UMass a 1-0 lead at 59:35.

"That first goal was a tough one to take," Anderson said. "To score two of the three goals in a game and lose is difficult to take. My team played well enough to win today."

Rudy said, "The goal was a product of [Rachel] LeDuc and [Colleen] Milliken pressurizing the ball. You could say that that goal was the difference but we would have played offensively the last 20 minutes if it was a tie game. And I am confident my team would have responded with another if it needed to."

The 10th ranked Minutewomen will look for win number eight on Wednesday against Dartmouth.

Minutemen deadlock Scarlet Knights

By JEFF CROFTS and ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

It was their third straight game on the road, their starting goalie was out with an injury, and they were facing the #25 team in the nation, the Rutgers Scarlet Knights.

That was the scenario the University of Massachusetts' men's soccer team (5-1-1,3-0-1 A-10) faced Saturday night. Instead of folding up the tent, which would have been understandable, Sam Koch's team battled to a 2-2 tie.

Rutgers, which held an impressive 14-1 Atlantic 10 record over the past two years, has won the last two A-10 titles, and is favored to win this year's crown as well.

However, the Minutemen proved on Saturday that this year's crown will be won in a dogfight and not a cakewalk.

Coming off a disappointing 3-1 loss at Dartmouth, UMass entered the game very intense, with junior Justin Edelman scoring at 8:23 of the first half.

Edelman's goal, his fourth of the year, set off fireworks between the two A-10 rivals, leading to more physical play. No more than six minutes later, Rutgers goalie Kori Hunter was issued a red card for attacking UMass junior forward Randy Jacobs.

Jacobs came in on a breakaway, but was tackled by Hunter, forcing Rutgers to play with 10 men for the rest of the game. This collision set the tone for the second half as well as the overtime.

Rutgers freshmen Rocky Strazzella booted a ball into the net at 38:27 to tie the score at 1-1 heading into halftime. It was the first goal of his career.

At 66:30 of the second half, the Scarlet Knights scored, when UMass junior Ted Priestly, trying to clear the ball, headed one past goalie Erick Gruber. Gruber was playing in place of sophomore starter Mark Wolf, injured while practicing earlier in the weekend.

UMass seemed dead, but at 85:01, junior co-captain Shawn Bleau took a pass from Edelman and shot one past the replacement goalie, Tony Faticoni.

Both UMass and Rutgers had chances in the overtime, but neither could convert as the game ended in a tie. Jacobs came the closest in the OT as he ripped a shot with 22 seconds left, which Faticoni covered up for his sixth and most important save.

The tie leaves both teams deadlocked at the top of the A-10 standings, with UMass coming home to Garber Field to face Providence on Wednesday at 2:00 p.m.

Minutemen down BU in home opener

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

Things just keep getting better for Mike Hodges and his University of Massachusetts football team.

One week after putting win number one in the books with a 7-3 decision over Holy Cross, UMass returned home to Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium on Saturday, downing Yankee Conference rival Boston University 30-28 before a crowd of 5,846.

Leading the UMass attack was freshmen tailback Rene Ingoglia, who rushed for 148 yards on 33 attempts (ninth best in all of college football on Saturday) as the Minutemen stormed to a 30-15 third quarter lead before holding off BU in the final minutes to seal the victory.

"It was a great game," said Hodges. "I think we did a little bit of everything today, and the only thing I'm upset about is that it wasn't sunny and 10,000 people didn't show up."

The Terriers got on the board first, as Scott Mallory hauled in an eight yard Walter Norton Jr. touchdown pass ten seconds into the second quarter giving BU their only lead of the game, 7-0.

UMass took the lead eight minutes later, as Ingoglia barreled in from the six-yard line for his first collegiate touchdown to bring the Minutemen within one.

Jim Maguire's extra point try was blocked, but tight end Steve Dembowski recovered the loose ball and ran it in giving the Minutemen two points and a lead they would never relinquish.

Minuteman quarterback Andrew McNeilly added to the UMass lead with just under a minute left in the half, turning what looked like a sure sack into a 14-yard scamper for the end zone, giving UMass a 14-7 lead.

"On that play, I'm supposed to fake the option and waggle the other way," said McNeilly. "I looked and saw nothing but white [BU jerseys] so I turned the other way and saw four or five BU players and just took off."

Massachusetts lined up for the Maguire extra point, choosing instead to have holder Tom Fasano throw to long snapper Jon Kromenhoek, giving the Minutemen a 16-7 halftime lead.

"We've had that play for two years," said Hodges. "It depends on how they line up against the muddle huddle, and if they don't adjust to it we're going to do it."

Backup Ingoglia responds well to challenge

Last Saturday was arguably the biggest challenge that Rene Ingoglia had faced in his young football career; thankfully for the University of Massachusetts football team, he was up to that challenge.

On 33 carries, Ingoglia trudged through the mud and torrential rain in his first collegiate start for an impressive 148 yards rushing on the day (4.5 yards/carry) and his first touchdown. The five-yard touchdown run came at an opportune time in the second quarter for the Minutemen, who were down by seven with just over six minutes left in the half.

"I just ran left off tackle and followed the blocking," he said. "When I smelled the goaline, I just put my head down and got in — it's as simple as that."

Indeed it looked "as simple as that" all day for the tough-nosed, redshirt freshman from Rochester, NY, who cut and sliced his way through the Boston University defense like a knife through butter. It wasn't always that easy for Ingoglia, however.

In his senior year at Bishop Kearney High, Ingoglia tore up his knee and had to undergo reconstructive surgery. Rehabilitation kept him out for the remainder of his high school career and also ended his hopes of playing Division I football (he was recruited by a number of Div. I schools). Enter UMass, which saw untapped talent in this young athlete and decided to take a chance on him.

"He didn't even practice last year because of his knee, but you couldn't tell that now," said head coach Mike Hodges. "You can't believe what he's been through with his knee. He's such a tough kid, though, and plays so aggressively — he's not afraid to go up against anybody.

"Sometimes I think he should be a linebacker, because that's his mentality."

Hodges isn't the only one who took notice of Ingoglia's strong performance on Saturday, though.

"The field conditions were pretty bad with all the rain," said BU head coach Dan Allen. "Somehow Ingoglia managed to have a solid day, though. He's a fine back and it was a great individual effort on his part."

BU defensive back Pablo Rodriguez agreed with Allen. "We didn't tackle him all day," said Rodriguez. "But you have to give credit to him — he had a great day."

Despite his performance against the Terriers last Saturday, Ingoglia is still hesitant to take full credit for his accomplishments.

"I have to give credit to the offensive line and our fullback Mike George (15-91,1 TD)," he said. "They are the ones who make it possible for me to have a day like this.

"We have so many other great backs on this team," he continued. "All are capable of coming in and doing a doing a quality job."

What does the future hold for Ingoglia, particularly against Rhode Island in two weeks?

"He's definitely going to start again," said Hodges. "He's got great speed, he's had no problems with his knee — we're very pleased with his performance and are excited about what he's going to do in the future for us."

Villone agrees to terms with Seattle Mariners

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Goodbye DC food, hello filet mignon.

Former University of Massachusetts left-handed pitcher and first-round draft pick Ron Villone agreed to terms Saturday with the Seattle Mariners, and will sign a contract today in Seattle.

Villone, a two-sport athlete for UMass, was picked 14th overall in the first round of June's major league baseball draft by the Mariners. He ended a lengthy negotiation process, agreeing to a contract which sources say includes a $550,000 signing bonus.

Sources indicated that the vice president of the Mariners flew into Amherst Saturday to talk directly with Villone, and an agreement was made after that meeting. However, UMass head baseball coach Mike Stone said that Villone has not and will not sign until he reaches Seattle.

"There's a stipulation in his contract that he go to Seattle and have preliminary meetings with them before he signs," Stone said.

Villone had threatened to hold out as long as possible and had returned to UMass in September to practice with the baseball team. His biggest concern was being treated fairly.

"I just want them to give me what I think I'm worth," he said in an interview earlier this month. "I just want to be treated as a person."

The 6-foot-3, 235 pounder will report to the Mariners' Instructional League team in Tempe, AZ this week, according to Stone. While Seattle's gain was the UMass pitching staff's loss, Stone was pleased that Villone was leaving for the big leagues.

"I'm happy, and having him as a former Olympian and first-round pick will help the baseball program," said Stone. "He held out and finally got what he wanted."

When Villone signs on the dotted line, it will be the exclamation point of his meteoric rise from obscurity to celebrity in less than 13 months. The left-hander played only two years with the UMass baseball team, and three with the football team.

He was not even drafted in the June 1991 major league draft after compiling a 4-3 record with 50 strikeouts and being named the A-10s left-handed pitcher of the year.

Villone followed that up last Spring with a 7-3 record, picking up 89 strikeouts and leading the nation in strikeouts per inning through much of the season. He was subsequently asked to tryout for the Olympic team and was drafted by the Mariners.

Villone was cut from the Olympic team, but, in a quirk of fate, was recalled by U.S. coach Ron Fraser, who apologized and asked him to go to Barcelona. He did, and was successful, picking up a 1-1 record and striking out 11 in 11 innings.

After the Olympics, Villone was honored with a parade by his home town, Bergenfield, NJ.

University faces suit from female athletes

By TRUDY TYNAN
Associated Press

AMHERST — University of Massachusetts athletic administrators, already the subject of a legislative inquiry, are now under fire from women athletes for dumping three varsity sports for women.

"What made me really mad was that I didn't feel there was equality in the way men athletes and women athletes were being treated," said senior Amy Ryan, who had been one of the leading players on the women's tennis team before it was eliminated last spring.

"When I was in high school, there were no problems like that. Everything was 50-50."

Especially galling, Ryan said Monday, was seeing the team cut even after the players independently raised enough money to cover their modest $5,000 budget.

"That's when we really felt we were not equally treated," Ryan said, adding that male soccer players took the field after an alumnus promised to cover that team's expenses.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien has told the faculty only that university officials were meeting privately with a lawyer for students seeking to reinstate the women's tennis squad, as well as the women's lacrosse and volleyball teams, said University spokeswoman Kay Scanlon.

The lacrosse team, which won the first NCAA Division I national championship in 1982, was eliminated in 1990. Women's volleyball was dropped in 1991.

The lawyer, Patricia Flannery of Boston, declined to comment Monday on the progress of the talks or the students complaints.

Glenn Wong, acting athletic director, did not return two telephone messages seeking comment. Provost Glen Gordon, who has headed the University's internal investigation into the athletic administration and is serving as acting dean of physical education, also did not return messages.

Wong and Gordon took over after Athletic Director Frances McInerney retired and his boss, David Bischoff, who had been both associate chancellor of athletics and dean of the school of physical education, resigned amid ongoing legislative inquiry into questionable spending by athletic administrators.

Irate alumni, including many former football players, pressed for the inquiry after cuts in the football program prompted them to review the University's books.

Over the past three years, UMass sports administrators have also announce plans to cut several men's sports, including soccer, water polo and men's tennis, to save money. But the tennis squad is the only men's team that hasn't been salvaged by school or private grants.

It is the second time in seven years that women's tennis has been eliminated, said former women's coach Edwin Gentzler, who voluntarily took a pay cut from $9000 to $1,000 to try to save the team.

Gentzler said that, with the reductions in the women's teams, the university's ratio of male and female athletes has slipped from about 60-40 to nearly 70-30. That level could be in violation of federal equal opportunity requirements, he contended.

"There's a lot of personal pain when all of a sudden your life's work is totally gone," said Gentzler.

Fang Lizhi, famous Chinese dissident, speaks out

By GEORGE ZHU
Collegian Correspondent

Editor's note: The following is a report on a telephone interview last Thursday night with Fang Lizhi, China's best known dissident physicist. Lizhi was the Deputy President of the University of Science and Technology of China and a member of the Chinese Academy of Sciences.

He was expelled from the Chinese Communist Party and the presidency in 1987 for his role in the democracy movement. In 1989, he was once again wanted by the government, forcing him to take refuge for over a year in the U.S. Embassy in Beijing.

Currently, Lizhi is in exile and has been a faculty member at the University of Arizona in Tuscon since January.

Three years after the Chinese army tanks crashed the Tiananmen Square pro-democracy demonstration, in which the Chinese army killed hundreds of innocent students and civilians, China's best-known dissident, Fang Lizhi, has not been forgotten.

"The Chinese government should release all student demonstrators that have been arrested," Lizhi said.

Lizhi, often referred to as China's Sakharov, topped the Chinese government's most-wanted list following the June 4 massacre in 1989.

He was then forced to take refuge at the U.S. Embassy in Beijing for over a year before the United States finally negotiated a settlement with Chinese authorities for Fang to leave China.

"I hope to go back to China one day, but for the time being I don't see what I can do there," Lizhi said.

Lizhi criticized the Bush Administration's foreign policy on China, describing it as a "failure." President Bush, once a U.S. envoy to Beijing, has pledged to veto legislation that would require China to satisfy a number of human rights and trade conditions for its most-favored nation tariff status to be renewed. Bush believes this would isolate China. "It has done little to help improve China's human rights situation," Lizhi said.

Lizhi, a world renowned astrophysicist, is a member of the International Center for Theoretical Physics at Trieste, Italy. He is also a recipient of the 1989 Robert F. Kennedy Human Rights Award in honor of his dedication and commitment to democracy and human rights in China.

Earlier that year, Lizhi wrote to Chinese senior leader Deng Xiaoping petitioning for the release of jailed dissident Wei Jingsheng and other political prisoners. The Chinese government abruptly rejected Lizhi's appeal.

"Economic prosperity does not necessarily lead to democracy and freedom," Lizhi said. "All concerned people

Report looks at status of UMass women

By MICHELLE BAYLISS

Issues facing women are being spotlighted in the Status of Women Council's annual report that was distributed this week to Faculty senators and all University faculty members.

"[The report] reflects the amount of work carried out and shows the intense interest in seeing that women's issues are attended to," said Catharine Porter, Status of Women Council's co-chairperson.

The council was established to make recommendations affecting the status of women on campus on matters ranging from recruitment, promotion and salaries, the granting of tenure, the establishment of day-care centers, to the granting of financial aid.

"We cover a broad spectrum of interests and we follow through when something is brought to us," Porter said. "We have a good record of addressing women's concerns and continue to do so."

Two major issues the council is continuing to address this year are the University of Massachusetts's compliance with Title IX, a law that bars sex discrimination at institutions receiving federal aid and the impact of the University Health fee on women, according to Porter.

The 1992 report stated the council solicited input from coaches, Athletic Department personnel and student athletes concerning Title IX.

"It's an issue we're continually faced with and we want to be on top of it," Porter said. "We're advocating for women."

The council is also keeping an eye on the impact

UMass Police Log

Compiled by Michael Day
Recent incidents recorded by the University's Department of Public Safety.

• A Resident Assistant in Washington Residence Hall was allegedly struck in the face Friday night by a male subject after the RA asked the male to remove alcohol from the dormitory, according to police.

The incident occurred at approximately 10 p.m. on Friday, police said. The RA reportedly pursued the male to the lobby area before being struck again.

Police are investigating the incident for possible Civil Rights violations.

• A PVTA bus was struck by another vehicle on Saturday afternoon on University Drive while the bus was attempting to make a turn, cracking a panel and rupturing a fuel tank, according to Al Byam, an official at PVTA.

The accident occurred at 3:30 p.m. on Saturday afternoon. The bus sustained approximately $3000 in damage. The fuel tank began to leak gasoline, which was contained by an absorbent designed to clean gas spills.

Byam stated that the operator of the car which struck the PVTA bus was issued a citation.

• Two men reported to police that their room in Hamlin Residence Hall had been ransacked Friday afternoon. A total of $280 was stolen from their dressers.

• Police arrested a 17 year-old Quincy man in connection with a fight that occurred in Mackimmie Residence Hall on Saturday morning. The man was charged with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, disorderly conduct and assault by means of a dangerous weapon (a knife).

• An Amherst man was charged with operating under the influence of alcohol and arrested at 3:15 p.m. on Saturday afternoon, according to police.

Jonathan Laurence, 32, was arrested in a traffic stop in front of Alumni Stadium.

• A head-on collision occurred in front of Lot 50 at 4:16 p.m. on Saturday, according to police. The operator of a vehicle swerved to miss a car pulling out of Lot 50, and collided with another oncoming vehicle. No injuries were reported, but the cost of damage was estimated to be more that $2000.

• A police cruiser was involved in a three-car accident Saturday night when it stopped to allow pedestrians to cross the street in front of Skinner Hall.

According to police, although the vehicle immediately behind the cruiser stopped safely, the car was struck from behind by another car and was slammed into the cruiser.

No one was injured in the 9 p.m. accident. Amherst Police issued the driver of the third vehicle a citation for failing to use care in stopping.

• University police and Amherst police are both investigating a fight which occurred in Gorman Residence Hall early Sunday morning. According to police, a man allegedly pointed a shotgun at other individuals involved in the altercation.

• Police reported the theft of three mountain bikes over the weekend. On Friday, a bicycle worth $400 was locked in front of McNamara Residence Hall when it was stolen.

Police reported the theft of a bike locked to a rack in front of Hamlin Residence Hall on Saturday. On Sunday, another locked bicycle was reported stolen from a rack in front of the Lederle Research Lowrise.

• A pizza delivery man was confronted and robbed by two males early Sunday morning in Cance Residence Hall, according to police. Two pizza's and $2 in cash were taken from the delivery man.

• A woman in Patterson Residence Hall reported damage done to her room at approximately 5:30 a.m. on Sunday. According to police, the woman was asleep when someone threw a rock through her window, causing an estimated $150 worth of damage.

Ancient Israeli city uncovered

By CHRIS TORCHIA
Associated Press

BOSTON — Like the volcanic eruption at Pompeii, a Babylonian king's destruction of an ancient city in Israel preserved artifacts that ordinarily would not have survived, archaeologists say.

Residents of Ashkelon left many possessions behind when they fled King Nebuchadnezzar and his army in 604 B.C., said Lawrence Stager, professor of archaeology at Harvard University.

"It's a snapshot of the residues and things just as they were left in place," Stager said.

"This is the irony of archaeology and history. Their suffering is at least now, from a distance, our good fortune."

A team of Harvard archaeologists working at Ashkelon this summer excavated a warehouse, an accounting office and a complete human skeleton sprawled amid smashed pottery.

They also uncovered an arched gateway, a mud-brick structure more than 12 feet high.

The buried remains were well-preserved amid the rubble left by fires set by Nebuchadnezzar's troops, said Joe Greene, curator of publications at the Harvard Semitic Museum, which has been sponsoring excavations at Ashkelon since 1985.

"The effect is like that of Pompeii, in which the instant that it happened is trapped in the layers that were destroyed," Greene said. He acknowledged that the finds themselves were less dramatic than those at Pompeii.

The Roman city of Pompeii was buried and thousands were killed when Mt. Vesuvius erupted in 79 A.D. Archaeologists found the remains of some victims in their last moments, including a pregnant woman and a man trying to shield her with a veil from the suffocating ash.

Archaeologists relish the phenomenon of sites that are well-preserved because of ancient disasters, said William Sumner, director of the Oriental Institute at the University of Chicago.

"Archaeologists are very ghoulish people," said Sumner, an archaeologist who has conducted digs in Iran. "We always delight in ancient catastrophes.

"What you find is objects of daily life more or less abandoned relationships among objects revealed to you right there on the ground."

Fire sometimes preserves wooden objects longer by turning them into charcoal, which is more resistant to decay, Sumner said.

Among the artifacts found at Ashkelon, located about 65 miles southwest to Jerusalem, were storage jars containing traces of charred wheat, a small scale and a dozen square weights.

In apparent signs of pillaging, archaeologists also found shattered earthenware pots lying beneath charred ceiling beams. The skeleton of a man was found sprawled on its back, its arms and legs flung out and its skull crushed.

"It gives one an eerie feeling, seeing this corpse lying there in place exactly where he fell during that siege," Stager said.

Russian officials visit University

By TAMI MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

Five Russian officials on a tour of Massachusetts will visit the University this week in their attempt to look at how cities and towns are run and financed, in addition to exploring possible links with local businesses.

They will meet this week with professors from the School of Management and the Department of Landscape Architecture and Regional Planning. Next week the Russians will be in Boston to meet with Boston's Mayor Ray Flynn and member's of Gov. William Weld's staff along with other state and city officials.

"Basically, they want to learn the way we run City Hall."

Robert Hopley,
visiting management lecturer

"Basically, they want to learn the way we run City Hall," said Robert Hopley, visiting management lecturer. "They want to find out how town and city administrations work, how the Chamber of Commerce fits in, what we do about regional planning, and how our system of taxation works."

Hopley said the five will meet with business people and government officials, share information and build contacts, in addition to establishing social and business ties in Massachusetts.

Focusing on municipal government, they will study U.S. inter-governmental relations, and the educational system at the University.

Alexandro Pedotov, the program's leader, is director of the Management Training Center, St. Petersburg, Russia, where the University's School of Management has an on-going exchange program.

The other four delegates, Vladislav Toumanov, Boris Polozovare, Alexandre Prokofiev and Alexandro Todontoov, are from Pskov, a large region located to the south of St. Petersburg. Toumanov is head of the Pskov regional administration. Polozovare is head of Pskov's regional development and redevelopment authority. Prokofiev is head of the Pskov city administration. Todontoov is deputy representative the Pskov region's president. Todontoov represents Boris Yeltsin in the Pskov region.

According to Hopley, the delegation has about 30 specific proposals from their region for various economic partnerships with U.S. firms.

TEAMS looking for assistants

Valuable tutoring program helps minority students

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Correspondent

A University-based tutoring program that is designed to offer a helping hand to linguistically and culturally diverse students is looking for new recruits.

Created in 1984 Tutoring Enrichment Assistance Model for Schools (TEAMS) has provided over 30,000 hours of tutoring to Asian, Latino, African American and other minority students by undergraduate students from several majors, not just education.

The TEAMS project collaborates with the School of Education and the Division of Continuing Education, in addition to joining with local public schools and alternative education programs, such as Westover Job Corps.

Funding for the TEAMS project comes from several sources such as: The "Just Do It" grant from the Nike Corporation for Kelly Elementary School in Holyoke and a grant from the Massachusetts Commitee Service Commission.

Other financial support is enlisted from the University of Massachusetts President's Office and a from a number of local community merchants.

"TEAMS is growing in number and changing in purpose," said Dawn Bond, project coordinator of the program and a graduate student of the School of Education. Primarily seen as a community service venture, TEAMS also addresses contemporary societal issues affecting education.

"We are concerned with class, race, and gender within the schools," said Director Robert Maloy. "We hope to provide a direction for change in schools as well as society."

Through multiculturally aware tutors, TEAMS hopes to combat societal ills within the American education system ["isms"].

Bond said the leadership of TEAMS exemplifies the mission of the project. TEAMS is engaged in a collective process at all times. The project coordinators, students, extract past experiences from tutors and integrate these ideas into the present program.

Essentially all directors Robert Maloy and Byrd Jones do is provide guidance to the program, while students

Friday night alternative

Club provides skits, music to campus

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Correspondent

The Upside Down club met in the Campus Center on Friday night for an evening of comedy skits and musical entertainment.

The Upside Down club is a Christian student social and inspirational organization made up of undergraduate and graduate students.

The clubs primary focus is to provide an alternative to nightclubs and house parties. Jeff Chartrand, president of the club, says it presents an opportunity for students of all nationalities and backgrounds to get together and socialize.

"We try to bring talent together and share this with other students. Many students just come out of curiosity and truly find themselves enjoying the atmosphere," said Chartrand.

Bobby Arsenault, a former UMass football player, believes Jesus Christ makes all the difference. Arsenault is also a campus minister.

Chip Mitchell, also a former UMass football player, was the moderator of the evening, and introduced the various acts.

George Baker, a UMass instructor and tenor-saxist played various tunes including a jazz track. Baker is an instructor in the performing arts dept.

Among the acts were the outrageous comedy duo "I hate when that happens" and "Kim and Kim" who sung a track by the Indigo Girls.

Also performing were Shawdra Poharski and Kelly Coon who along with guitarist Brian Thompson sung the popular theme song One Tin Soldier.

Jeff Chartrand also a guitarist and lyracist who sung a familiar track by popular recording artist John Cougar Mellencamp and James Taylor's You've got a friend.

"This is our very first activity this semester and our goal is to provide a place so students can have good clean fun, no pretension, no expectations," said Chartland.

Michelle Nevel a sophomore at UMass and a liberal arts major believes that the club has a lot of potential.

"It's a great idea. [This club has] a lot of talent," said Nevel.

Jean Pow a graduate student at UMass studying clinical psychology major says she believes its an excellent alternative to traditional college entertainment.

"[The club provides a] variety of entertainment and a nice atmosphere," said Pow.

Tomas Olssom an exchange student from Sweden, who is studying economics said he arrived not expecting to have a lot of fun.

"I love it! And there are great people here, very nice," said Olssom.

Center serves 15,000

The Everywoman's Center serves 15,000 women a year from the Five College area and offers a variety of services.

"Often times a woman waits until she is in a crisis to use our services," said Carol Wallace, the director of the Everywoman's Center.

The Everywoman's Center has a number of support groups this semester. "We are offering a post-abortion support group, rape survivors support group which includes our Counselor/Advocate Program and an incest survivors support group," Wallace said.

In the past three years budget cuts have eliminated five direct program services, such as, the Outreach/Public Relations, Bridge Program, Counseling Services, W.A.G.E.S., and the Working Women's Program, according to the Organizational Report of the EWC's 1991 Fiscal Year Report.

The report states "Significant unmet need exists among students seeking counseling services, particularly among women students. Elimination of Counseling Services Program within EWC [Everywoman's Center] increased the amount of unmet need."

Also, that "Most women's centers offer

$1,200 raised for orphanage

By SEEMA MALHOTRA
Collegian Correspondent

The South Asian Club held their second benefit dance on Saturday night in the Bluewall in order to raise money for an orphanage in India.

The orphanage, located in Cuddapah, Andhra Pradesh in India, was founded six months ago.

The orphanage is run by a committee of eleven members, who organize fund-raising and oversee its day-to-day operations. Although it is supported by other organizations in India and abroad, the University South Asian Club is a major contributor.

All six children attend a local school in India. While the orphanage will not be taking any more children immediately, it hopes to expand in the future, according to club members.

The dance on Saturday was co-organized by South Asian Club members Sonalee Patel, Deepa Krishnakumar and Roopa Reddy. It was attended by almost three hundred people and money was raised through donations and ticket sales.

The crowd danced to a variety of Indian and western music and the evening raised an estimated $1,200 for the orphanage.

"It's something very real. The [orphanage] is right now up and going with our help," said Deepa Krishnakumar, a senior civil engineering major who hopes to visit the orphanage in January.

"Though it's not a big sacrifice on our side it makes a big difference to the people in India," Krishnakumar said. "We are very proud of the response and cooperation of all our friends and supporters."

Because of the success of last semester's "Jumma Chumma Nite" and of Saturday night's event, the South Asian Club is planning another dance next Spring.

Students are coming out for fire drills

By TAMI MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

Have your coats and keys handy this week. Environmental Health and Safety will conduct fire drills in all residence halls.

According to Keith E. Hoyle, senior fire prevention officer at EH&S, Massachusetts General Law states they must conduct fire drills once each semester. Hoyle said they traditionally hold them within the first month of the semester.

"New students have no idea what the fire alarm in their residence all sounds like," Hoyle said. "This is the one and only time we will conduct a drill."

According to Hoyle, his office gets help from the student fire and first aid unit, in addition to the Physical Plant suppling a fire alarm technician. Hoyle is not anticipating any problems with the fire drills.

"The students are generally pretty cooperative," Hoyle said.

Over the summer the University installed over $600,000 in state-of-the-art fire alarms and sprinkler systems in Emerson, James, Melville and Thoreau Residence Halls and John Adams Tower.

These systems will provide better protection for residents and will reduce the number of accidental alarms, according to David Beaudin, associate fire prevention officer.

Although the new equipment makes the buildings much safer than before, it will not reduce the number of malaciously pulled alarms, according Hoyle.

"Only the residents that live there can change that," Hoyle said.

Evil machine in tower library tracks student

The security system at the Tower Library has run amok in a government-sponsored conspiracy to thwart the study attempts of leftist female students. Well, not exactly, but there does appear to be a theme developing at the climax of my library visits as of late.

The first time, I greeted the jarring alarm with shock and immediate compliance.

Needless to say, the Keepers of the Books were placated when it was established that there was no guilt on my part. It seems that certain textbooks from the Annex make the damnable machine hysterical. A swift scanning of my possessions on a suspiciously medical-looking implement quieted the beast's spastic histrionics, and I was on my merry, albeit shaken, way.

Lori
O'CONNOR .

Last night, however, I was horrifically weary as I made my way to the exit. It was 11:55, and four hours of truly significant studying had reduced my cognitive processes to that of a two-year-old. Car. Home. Bed. Sleep.

"Beep! Beep! Beep! Beep!"

Once again, my id squealed, "Tee hee! I stole three large print editions of Macrame Fashions for the Family while you weren't paying attention! Wipe that surprised look off your face!"

Once again, I was forced to empty the highly personal contents of my backpack onto the highly impersonal formica counter top. Resigned and humiliated, I fielded the rapid-fire interrogation for a second time.

"What is this book?"

"Where did you get it?"

"What about that in the bag?"

"Have you ever bitten into a wintergreen Lifesaver in the dark?"

Okay, so the latter is a fictionalized insertion. Yet the fact remains that I would have answered any question, regardless of its relevance to escape. Yes, I said escape with my rapidly plummeting pride intact. There is something amiss when an innocent library-goer feels as though she has stumbled into an Orwellian nightmare, suddenly tempted to propel her body over fierce metal turnstiles in order to flee what has become, for her, a literary Alcatraz.

Don't get me wrong. I harbor no resentment towards the Organic Guardians of the Written Word. I realize that shrieking, paranoid, demon device (which I secretly suspect can see through my clothes) that I despise. Upset at its inability to be a metal detector, disgruntled with its relatively low rank on the annoying machine hierarchy, it has chosen me as an outlet upon which it will vent its frustrations.

I shouldn't be surprised. I've never had any luck with gadgets, starting way back in '76 with the smoky self-destruction of my Holly Hobbie Bake It Quick and Tasty Oven. This is simply another episode in a long history of harassment by bleeping machines.

You can take me seriously on one note, however. The next time I muster up enough bravado to venture back into the depths of that saggy architectural montrosity, I shall be transporting some cutting edge, day-glo sexual paraphernalia in my bag. That way, all involved will be blushing — not just myself.

Reality is dead, long live television

The smoke is clearing. The wreckage of Los Angeles lies all around; the dead are numerous. Standing amongst it (camera closes in), the Fresh Prince of Bel Air is helping the cleanup, discovering a fresh sense of responsibility to the community (roll opening credits). The injured are being rushed into the tender care of Doogie Howser, M.D., and litigation is beginning in the offices of L.A. Law.

Oh America, one wondered how you'd heal these open wounds. What balm could bring relief to such raw injustice? Re-invention, of course. Cut up on video in manageable portions, into something understandable, something, even, with a moral at the end. The riots can be portioned off, packaged for the autumn season and forgotten.

Jesse
ARMSTRONG

The Republican attack on "cultural elites" is self deserving, it is the producers of Hollyweird who take messy unfair life and put a gloss of fatuous optimism over it. There was no silver lining to the clouds of smoke that billowed from L.A. during the riots, no reassessment of the Reagan-Bush era of racist re-entrenchment, no catharsis for the African-American population. So instead Hollywood, maybe out of gratitude for not being burnt to the ground, will color one in. A Learning Experience.

Anyway, since the L.A. riots incorporated television and video, it is only fair exchange that now television plots can incorporate the L.A. riots.

In Time magazine, the New York Times and the Boston Globe there are long articles trying to understand the meaning of an attack by the vice-president on the fictional birth of a fictional baby in a situation comedy. They look too hard. A strict distinction between fact and fiction has been difficult to maintain for years in the arena of American public life. Reality is dead; long live television.

Surely no one can have misunderstood the meaning of Reagan. Reagan wasn't a president, he was an image of a president. A kindly, strong, 100 percent American image. The American public doesn't care about Iran-Contra because deception and manipulation aren't congruent with his image. It doesn't fit. But for Nixon it fitted perfectly, send him down! Kennedy will always be loved; he left such a Jimmy Dean-clean corpse, and what a photogenic exit. Forget the Bay of Pigs fiasco and taking the world to the edge of nuclear destruction, because he followed two primary rules: leave them wanting more, and leave them with a mystery.

Tim Robbins' new movie, "Bob Roberts," is a film, he says, "against the Hollywoodization of Washington." He might as well make a movie, as Kurt Vonnegut might say, against glaciers. However, the film is a fine satire on the image-reality crossover. Robbins is also astute enough to have noted how easy it is for fiction to be subverted into the hands of demagogues. He has included in the "Bob Roberts" contract a clause that prevents any of the right wing parodies of '60s protest songs (e.g.. "The Times They Are A-Changin' Back") from being released on a soundtrack album.

In the '92 campaign the battle for celebrity endorsements has been raging: Arnold Schwartzenegger opened George Bush's campaign in the New Jersey primary, while Richard Dreyfus waved off Bill Clinton and Al Gore. But at least Schwartzenegger and Dreyfus got to take time off. Bush and Clinton must play their parts full time at election time, and just when they get used to a role some damn image consultant comes and tells them to stop being fire-breathing-convention-Bush but turn into Uncle-shot-down-in-action-dependable-Bush or some other unlikely transformation. Poor Bush, he's a bad president because he's a bad actor... he just can't get... those. . . ur, folksy lines out. . . um. . . keeps on, er, stumbling. He should stick to politics, something he's good at.

Of course your image is never fixed; you never know when you're safe. Poor Cristofal Colon — they wanted to make him a saint in 1866; now he might become the original white devil. The images will be battling it out soon, at a cinema near you!

The American dream destroyed?

With most of America spending its time looking for these so called "family values," and spending less time caring for each other, it doesn't surprise me when I hear stories like Svetlana Speyer's.

Svetlana came to this country in the 1950s. Like many looking to the West, she had hoped to have her share of that infamous American dream. Sadly enough some forty years later Svetlana feels her hopes of that dream are all but gone.

David
RIVERA

For 18 years, day in and day out, Svetlana worked at the UMass library using her skills in Russian and German to better the library and the many thousands of students that went through its revolving doors. Unjustly, all her years of work may have been for nothing. Just this past September 21, Svetlana was told to pack her things and leave the library.

You see, Svetlana is a mother of a teenage girl, and her family fits that mold some Americans don't consider a family. She's a single parent with one income — hers.

A week before her dismissal, Svetlana received a memo informing her that her work hours were going to change from day to evening. She saw this change as a threat to her family life. Pleading her case to the library administration, Svetlana could find no one to sympathize with her situation.

At the age of 52, Svetlana felt she couldn't neglect her parenting, especially with a young daughter growing and changing before her eyes. "I couldn't make that choice between my daughter and my work," Svetlana said. "I guess I'll have to let the library choose."

Svetlana decided her family was far more important to her, so she continued her regular work hours with full knowledge that her superiors would consider her "insubordinate."

"I took a risk and came in at my regular time," Svetlana recalled. "Soon after I got there they told me to pack my things and leave."

People like Svetlana are rare in these days of political sound bites and Hollywood ideals. No weekly sit-com here, she's a real Murphy Brown taking risks against great odds for her strong beliefs.

Svetlana doesn't make much money — she never did — but she had hoped to send her daughter to UMass, a hope which may now be impossible. If she loses her job because of her stand, Svetlana knows all too well that her health benefits and pension are gone. Sounds bad? It gets worse.

Her father, recently diagnosed with lung cancer, is hospitalized and fighting for his life and she had to seek medical help for all the stress from the last few weeks.

"If they fire me, then I won't be able to collect unemployment. . . I don't know what will happen after that."

In her 18 years at the library Svetlana said she never expected anything like this to happen. Oddly enough she carries a letter, praising her work at the library, from the very person who asked her to leave.

"They don't take my parenting seriously," she said while trying to hold back tears. "I'm just trying to raise my child and make a living."

In this so called "kinder and gentler nation" of ours we sometimes forget the values that really matter. The flag-waving and horn-blowing rhetoric coming out of Washington can cloud our vision of what's truly valuable. Not Hollywood make-believe but real values, values like Svetlana's.

Having no idea what's going to happen, she only hopes to return to her job and raise her family the way she feels is best, the way she knows is best — her way.

No more storm troopers needed

This editorial has been written as a response to Keith F. Meadows' letter [Collegian, Sept. 23] calling for more police presence outside the bars in Amherst. I strongly disagree with this opinion.

At all times police presence around Amherst center is more than adequate and some would say oppressive. What are these violent episodes that Keith alludes to? And why aren't they on the page next to this editorial with the minor possessions and jaywalkers?

As a fifth year student at the University, I have frequented the bars of Amherst and can count on one hand the number of times I've witnessed so much as a pushing match outside the bars.

As a result of recent restrictions on social activities in the Amherst area, specifically the implementation of keg laws and a general crackdown on parties, students have been forced to the bars. The spontaneous gathering of people outside the bars is one of the last ungoverned social happenings. This last bastion of young, fun loving people does not require additional storm troopers.

If Keith feels he needs a police escort to get a slice of pizza at Antonio's, I suggest he gets delivery and stays off the streets of any major metropolitan area.

The janitor question is absurd

The janitor question at the Campus Center is another example of management bordering on the absurd.

These people are being treated more like a commodity, instead of the resource they are. There is obviously a need for more permanent positions. The dangerous trend here is the exploitation of the student work force to fill this need.

Yes, budgets are tight, but employees here have already suffered enough: no pay raises since 1988, furloughs, health insurance increases and layoffs. To have their lives turned upside down and their shifts changed is absurd. To replace these employees with students [Collegian, Sept. 24] is disturbing.

How many work study students know their labor rights as hourly workers? How many are paid benefits? Are they instructed on basic health and safety issues? One bad injury can do serious damage to a student's education and future.

So, as we welcome more work study students into the work force, I hope the administration and student representatives can work together to prevent this exploitation. And, to the management of the Campus Center: don't be absurd.

Man shot following argument

Massachusetts resident currently in critical condition

BLACKSTONE, Mass., (AP) — A man was critically injured when he was shot in the stomach following an argument that began in Woonsocket, R.I., police said yesterday.

A police officer witnessed the shooting, according to authorities.

Police said David Jean of Blackstone was shot Sunday night with a blast from a shotgun. Jean was in critical condition at Rhode Island Hospital in Providence late this morning.

Four people were arrested in Woonsocket in connection with the shooting, police said.

Three brothers, Keith Lambert, 21, Kenneth Lanbert, 18, and Rodney Lambert, 26, all of Woonsocket: and Jeffrey Masisak, 19, also of Woonsocket, all were arrested on fugitive from justice warrants, said Capt. Herve Landreville, detective chief in Woonsocket.

Officers said the argument started in Woonsocket about 7:20 p.m. Sunday, and a group of people followed Jean from there to Louie's Auto Body shop in Blackstone, where he works.

A fight broke out, but the group left before police arrived. The suspects allegedly returned later with an ax, pipes, and a sledgehammer, and again a fight broke out.

Officers said a dog was hit over the head with a pipe and the windows of the body shop were smashed.

Later, Officer Steven Livingstone was questioning Jean about the damage when two men came around the side of the building. One fired a shot at Jean in front of Livingtstone, police said.

Jean was hit in the stomach, and Louis Martinelli, owner of the building, in the hand. Martenelli was treated at the hospital and released. The alleged gunmen escaped, but were traced to Woonsocket.

Years of abuse leads woman to kill with iron

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — A woman who says years of abuse compelled her to stab her boyfriend with a curling iron asked a pardon board Monday to commute her eight to a 15-year manslaughter sentence.

But relatives of victim Milton Nixon said Patricia Allen was the abuser in the relationship. Allen, of Boston, is the second of eight imprisoned women to go before the Advisory Board of Pardons seeking reviews of their sentences. The women maintain they killed their partners because they were battered . Allen said her attorney declined to introduce evidence about her alleged prolonged abuse at the trial.

Allen, 35, broke down in tears at one point while describing the beatings she alleged she suffered.

"I'm very sorry for what happened," Allen said. "I never meant to kill anyone. I live in pain every day."

Allen told the board that Nixon beat her repeatedly in the course of their three-year relationship, and that he was particularly abusive after using drugs and alcohol. She said she has a permanent black eye and a bump on her head because he hit her in the head and kicked her in the eye while wearing work boots. She said she went to the hospital emergency room several times, but was kept waiting and decided not to stay for treatment.

Mary Greenwald, an attorney for Allen, said her client was a virtual prisoner in her own home because Nixon cut off her contact with relatives and friends. She said neighbors heard fights between the two, and said Nixon boasted to his boss that he had given Allen a black eye.

Allen is seeking immediate eligibility for parole. Under the current terms of her sentence, she will not be eligible for parole until 1994.

Board members will make a recommendation to Gov. William F. Weld about Allen's case.

The board has not yet made a recommendation in the case of Elaine Hyde, who came before it in July seeking a commutation in the death of her husband on similar grounds.

Earlier this year, Weld expanded the criteria for reviewing commutations to include battered women's syndrome.

Members of the board of pardons Monday questioned Allen about an incident prior to Nixon's death when he was was hospitalized because he was stabbed in the back. Nixon told authorities that Allen stabbed him with a butcher knife.

Board members said they were troubled by Allen's version of the story. She said she was peeling potatoes with the knife when Nixon came up behind her and tried to choke her.

"How could you stab him in the back? I don't see it," said board member Ruth Anne Jones.

"Your credibility is very much on the line here," Hooley said.

On the night of his death in 1987, Allen said she was using a curling iron when Nixon came upstairs and grabbed her, after he had attacked her earlier in the day.

American Indian Dance Theatre to premiere new suite

COURTESY NEW WORLD THEATRE
A member of the American Indian Dance Theatre company.

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

Are you looking at another uneventful Wednesday night? If you are in pursuit of something more enthralling than your average sit-com and more educational than that History reading that is due tomorrow, The American Indian Dance Theatre is playing your tune.

In cooperation with The New World Theatre, this distinguished company will perform a variety of not only tunes but dances in the premier of Eastern Woodlands Suite tomorrow evening.

Wednesday's program will consist of traditional ceremonial, seasonal, spiritual, and social chants, songs, and dances.

"During each performance, audiences experience many styles of American Indian dancing," said director Hanay Geiogamah. "All of our dances are traditional and authentic, but have been staged as theatrical pieces. In making this transition, however, we have been careful not to alter the basic structure of the dances."

Also authentic are the hand-made outfits of the dancers, traditionally worn at ceremonials, festivals, and powwows.

Dancers and musicians from the Dakotas, Southwest Canada, and the Great Plains represent fourteen tribes, all of which contribute aspects of their cultures to the performance.

"We were committed to forming a professional company featuring the best dancers and musicians from the Native American world. We also wanted to cross tribal lines and create an integrated company from a variety of tribes and tribal cultures," explains producer Barbara Schwei.

The Eastern Woodlands Suite promises to be a great show. Do not miss the chance to admire and share the experience of some of our nation's richest yet least appreciated cultures.

The American Indian Dance Theatre will perform at 8 p.m. at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. Tickets are $18 general; half price for five-college students. Call 545-2511 for more information.

Billy Crystal sparkles in 'Memories of Me'

Adam Scott Roberts' ace video pick

By ADAM SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Correspondent

When Harry Met Sally he was driving to New York City from Northwestern University. Once in New York he decided he had to leave by being a City Slicker. Recently, he's declared himself Mr. Saturday Night. But before he decides to take on the comedy clubs of Manhattan he ventures to the City of Angeles in Memories of Me, this week's video pick.

It's easy to say that the past performances of Billy Crystal have all been comical. This time the Jewish New Yorker continues to make audiences laugh but with a serious underlying message. Comedy is used in this film to hide the characters pain.

Memories of Me is a story about Abbie Polin (Billy Crystal) and his father Abe Polin (Alan King). Abbie is a New York City surgeon who, after suffering a heart attack, is forced to examine his relationship with the father that left him and his mother as a child.

Through the help and supportiveness of his girlfriend and co-worker, Dr. Lisa McCardle (JoBeth Williams of Poltergeist) Abbie decides to visit his father in Los Angeles. Not only is it apparent that Abbie and his father do not get along, but it seems impossible for them to ever get along due to their bitterness toward each other.

It is not until Abbie realizes that his father is dying of a brain aneurysm that he tries to put the negative memories of his father behind him. By the time Abe and his son are able to talk without fighting it is too late to make up for their lost time.

Crystal's character continuously laughs at his childhood by saying: "When my parents got divorced my favorite toy was a suitcase." And when asked by Williams' character what his father's profession is, Crystal responds: "He's a professional embarassment."

Of all the Billy Crystal film's that I have seen, each one is either equal to or an improvement on his previous works and that is why I think he's one of the funniest actors in the Steve Martin and Joe Pesci group of comical actors. His performance makes the bumpy relationship between father and son seem very realistic. (I can't but help hear Cat Stevens's singing "Father and Son" at this very moment.)

If any one performance of Memories of Me stands out among the rest, it would have to be Alan King's portrayal of Abe Polin, a man who is convinced he is an actor (emphasis on or) and not an extra. King shines by actually making the viewer believe he is an actor despite the fact that Abe doesn't have any speaking parts and has been on the same soap opera as an ill patient for over thirty years.

His son (Crystal) asks him how he feels going to work everyday as an extra that sits in a bed by saying: "Don't you feel like a putz?" Abe's response is: "Where else can you sit around all day and still get paid?." The answer is: Hollywood!

Abe is very into the Hollywood lifestyle whether he is pretending to talk on a plastic toy phone in his copvertible while driving L.A. highways or just by having pictures of himself adorning the walls of his apartment. Abe even has an ego when telling people he's been an extra in The Towering Inferno with Steve McQueen or that he danced by Grace Kelly in To Catch A Thief.

Crystal's Abbie can't understand how his father can be happy with himself. In a moving scene that may cause your eyes to become glassy, Abbie says to his father: "What I want from you? You could not give me if your life depended on it?" King responds: "What's that?" and a very angry Crystal yells "Love! You were a fraud as a father, as husband, you are a fake Abe! You're not an actor!" The father and son go as far as to stop their car in a tunnel on the highway to fist fight.

Crystal realizes that his father is not all together when Abe says things such as "I'm so glad I lived to see your Barmitzvah." One of the most important and meaningful quotes in the whole film is Abe's monologue of "Empty streets, listening to the sounds of your own foot steps, shutters closed, blinds drawn, and the doors locked against you and your not sure if your walking towards something or just walking away. Inherit the wind." It's important because it describes his feelings of being alone.

Overall, Memories of Me ie is smart, witty, and entertaining. The one liner jokes are cute and funny. But not even jokes could cover up the true meaning of this some what painful tale.

New Extreme effort: memorable funk metal

By MATT VAUTOUR
Collegian Correspondent

Three Sides to Every Story
Extreme
A & M Records

Anyone who saw Extreme as a one hit wonder that was no deeper than its megahit "More than Words," needs to look no further than their newly released Three Sides to Every Story.

At midnight last Monday, about 2000 fans lined up outside Strawberries in Dedham to get the first copies of Extreme's new album and to meet Extreme's Gary Cherone (vocals), Nuno Bettencourt (guitar) Pat badger (Bass), and Paul Geary (Drums).

Three Sides to Every Story is a musical masterpiece. Extreme shows their diverse musical style throughout the album. Their range goes from the piano ballard "Seven Sundays" and the acoustic "Tragic Comic" to rockers like "Warheads" and the first single "Rest in Peace."

The fifth track "Cupid's Dead" even includes a verse of rap. The lead vocals of Gary Cherone shine throughout the album. Guitarist Nuno Bettencourt, considered by many to be one of the best young musicians on the hard rock scene today, showcases his talent all through Three Sides to Every Story, with memorable solos on "Cupid's Dead" and "Our Father."

The Boston based hard rock\funk metal band's third effort shows a strong political side to the band's nature. Extreme takes on the issue of world peace in the songs "Warheads" and "Rest in Peace."

The band has always been outspoken against racism. The song "Peacemaker Die" includes a portion of Dr. Martin Luther King's "I Have a Dream Speech."

The third track "Color Me Blind" includes the lines: "Picture the world without any color/You couldn't tell one face the other/I don't understand why we fight with our brother/Color be blind, just to love one another."

The album is divided into "three sides," Yours, Mine, and The Truth. The Yours section is mostly political. Mine is typical Extreme, including the ballad "Seven Sundays" and "Tragic Comic." The Truth is three soul searching, almost philosophical songs typified in the song "Am I Ever going to Change."

Including the issue in their music is nothing new to Extreme, who performed at last summer's "Concert for Life," a tribute to Freddy Mercury of Queen, who died of AIDS. In their second album "Pornograffiti," Extreme challenged the issue of the abundance of explicit sex in the entertainment and advertising industries.

Extreme appeared on the rock scene in

1989 with their self titled debut album. It achieved minimal success, as the videos for "Kid Ego," "Little Girls," and "Mutha (Don't Wanna Go to School Today)" getting exposure on rock stations and MTV's Headbanger's Ball.

Extreme broke through with their second album Pornographitti. Their third single "More than Words" went all the way to number one on the singles chart.

They spent last summer touring as the opener for such acts as David Lee Roth, ZZ Top, and Bryan Adams. They finished by performing in "The Concert for Life" with all proceeds going to AIDS research.

Fans hoping to find a sequel to "More than Words" will have to look elsewhere, but fans looking for a powerful and politically-oriented rock album will find it in Three Sides to Every Story.

Mr. Lupo takes a sneak peek at new flick Hero

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Who says there are no heroes?

Hero, a new film by acclaimed director Stephen Frears will attempt to answer that question this Friday as this social satire comedy opens in a theater near you.

These award-winning actors come together to weave what promises to be a hilarious moral comedy with irony running through it all.

Hero is a contemporary comedy about some unusual forms of heroism: a sleazy, small time crook who stumbles into it (Dustin Hoffman), a desperate stranger who steals it (Andy Garcia) and a big time television reporter who gets the story of her lifetime (Geena Davis). These award-winning actors come together to weave what promises to be a hilarious moral comedy with irony running through it all.

When a plane carrying fifty-four passengers — including reporter Gale (Davis) — crash lands in the middle of a driving rainstorm, conniving hood Bernie LaPlante (Hoffman) is the first person to reach the chaotic scene. In spite of himself, LaPlante spontaneously and anonymously risks his life to save a plane full of people...only to leave the scene without anyone seeing him.

Gale conducts a city-wide search for "the angel of Flight 104" with only one of LaPlante's shoes (Cinderella, anyone?). In steps John Bubber (Garcia), where a chance encounter with LaPlante has given him a certain shoe, mud-caked and naturally, a perfect match. Bubber assumes the identity of the hero and becomes an inspiration to the whole city. Then it gets just a little more complicated...

Double Academy Award winner Dustin Hoffman describes his character as "a working man who wants to be a respectable citizen, but he's not very good at it. Whether it's being a husband, a father or a thief, he always manages to shoot himself in the foot."

Academy Award winner Geena Davis follows up her role in the hit A League of Their Own to play a woman, according to Davis, is "ambitious, driven and confused."

Hero is two-time Oscar nominated director Stephen Frears' third American film. With early art house hits such as My Beautiful Launderette, Frears won enormous critical acclaim for his Oscar-nominated triumph Dangerous Liaisons and The Grifters. With such an impressive pedigree, Hero is a definite must-see.

Physical Graffiti gives a rockin' tribute show with style at Pearl St.

By RACHEL D. MEDANIC
Collegian Correspondent

From the personas, costumes and body language to the musical precision and passion of Led Zeppelin, it was clear last Thursday night at Pearl Street that Physical Graffiti's zeppelin had landed.

Originally from Connecticut, Physical Graffiti, the tribute band known as "The Ultimate Led Zeppelin Show," does more than just perform Led Zeppelin's songs. The four man band strives to achieve all levels of authenticity by acting, talking, dressing and performing as John Bonham, Jimmy Page, Robert Plant and John Paul Jones did in their heyday.

Five years of effort clearly shows in the performance each member gave. Putnam's talent is as genuine as Plant's.

An hour and a half after the doors opened, Physical Graffiti sizzled the evening open with an amazingly precise rendition of "The Song Remains the Same," a characteristic that continued for the rest of the show. They continued on until 11:30 p.m. with superb performances of "Babe I'm Gonna Leave You" and "What Is And What Should Never Be," accompanied by Matt Hetherman (Jimmy Page) on the acoustic guitar.

In an interview backstage, the band revealed that Physical Graffiti had been "their life" for the past five years. Recently they had met an agent in New York who helped them book their next show, to be performed on the 28th of September, in Tel Aviv, Israel.

After a fifteen minute break from the first set, the band came back for another dynamite hour, beginning with "No Quarter," from Houses of the Holy, featuring Gary Fox (as John Paul Jones) on the synthesizer for the introduction. The song even came complete with the "the howling and moaning dogs of doom."

Another highlight was Johnny Mac's (John Bonham) ten minute drum solo, including a beautifully improvised section between "We're Gonna Groove" and "Whole Lotta Love," the ending piece for the evening.

Five years of effort clearly shows in the performance each member gave. Doug Putnam's "Plantesque," charismatic stances and hand motions added visually to the already uncanny vocal imitations. Putnam's talent is as genuine as Plant's, right down to the harmonica solo in "Nobody's Fault But Mine."

Hetherman's mastery of passing the cigarette for a drag between himself and Putnam was as if the audience was watching Page and Plant. His performance highlights included the playing of his guitar with a bow, and fingers that never missed a note. One instance was his performance of "Heartbreaker," during which his fingers travelled up and down his guitar like manic iron-gripping spiders.

Showgoers left Pearl Street, frustrated that their chants, shouts and cheers for encore went unanswered. The band was feeling the same frustration backstage. Pearl Street management had told them that there wasn't time left for more.

The band performed a diverse array of selections, with the majority coming from Houses of the Holy, Led Zeppelin II, Led Zeppelin, and Physical Graffiti.

Physical Graffiti is an experience on many levels that should definitely not be missed.

DEANS LIST

One of the University's highest priorities is its commitment to provide opportunities for academic growth. I am pleased, therefore, to recognize those of you who earned Deans List status for the Spring Semester 1992.

This level of achievement - 3.5 or higher semester average with twelve or more graded credits - is attained by fewer than 20% of the undergraduate student body. Such outstanding performance is a source of pride to the faculty, staff, your student colleagues, and, of course, your parents.

Thank you for the credit you bring to the University through your achievement.

Richard O'Brien, Chancellor

PRESS RELEASES

To publicize your achievement, the University News Office will be issuing a press release to your hometown newspaper if you are a Massachusetts resident. Out of state students are requested to pick up a press release form at 200 Manson Hall (second floor). For further information, please call 545-0444.

ADDITIONS/OMISSIONS

The Deans List was based on grades received and posted by the Registrar's Office by August 21, 1992. If you had a grade change after that date (including making up an "Incomplete" or had a missing or late grade recorded after that date), and believe you now qualify for Deans List status, please fill out a form available at the Information Data Bank, 2nd floor lobby counter, Whitmore, attach verification, and return the form as indicated.

REMINDER: ONLY GRADED CREDITS ARE CALCULATED IN DETERMINING DEANS LIST ELIGIBILITY. PASS/FAIL CREDITS ARE NOT INCLUDED.

The Deans List is prepared for publication by Student Affairs Special Services which pays for this listing as a service to the campus community. The cooperation of "The Massachusetts Daily Collegian" is acknowledged and appreciated and the international community should exercise pressure and influence on the Chinese regime to improve its human rights record."

Lizhi laments about the growing trend in China where intellectuals are leaving their academic positions for more profitable ventures.

"I'm worried this may cause the shortage of education and research professionals in China," Lizhi said. "However, it is their right to choose what to do."

Lizhi first became known to the West when he was invited to visit President George Bush for a state dinner in Beijing three-and-a-half years ago, but was stopped by the Chinese security police.

counseling services. The public expectation that EWC offers counseling services continues regardless of whether the services exist."

Some programs still existing at the Everywoman's Center are: the support groups, the Resource/Referral services and the Graduate Women's Program.

The Resource/Referral Program "maintains and develops an information and referral system which includes general health, legal, social, and political resources available to women," stated in the pamphlet of available programs.

"The Graduate Women's Program offers advocacy for graduate women as both individuals and in a group," Wallace said. The program provides support for graduate women and offers workshops on issues such as self-esteem and time management, according to Wallace. The Everywoman's Center is one of the places on the UMass campus which continues to raise awareness of women's issues, said Wallace.

The center's director said, "the comprehensive rape crisis services provide the highest quality services and puts the University on the cutting edge of campus' responding to sexual assault, along with its education of faculty, staff and students on violence against women."

Third World Affairs

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

Consider an alternative

One could rightfully assume that the term "Third World Nations" could be slightly demeaning. The word "Third" automatically suggests a certain level and is possibly a type of social stratification. The negative connotations that the phrase carries can be a bit degrading to those who live or have lived within these so called "Third World " countries.

Tricia
WILSON

Economically, there is some basis for the above mentioned title. However, a term such as "Developing Nations" would be less suggestive of purposefully demeaning intentions, and quite more accurate, since the nations referred to by the discussed term are indeed undergoing development. And who sets the economic standards that countries, or nations have to meet to obtain the status or title of "Developed Nations"? It is the Western superpowers, the United States, or perhaps the United Nations, but certainly not the "Third World " nations.

Most of the countries that are still developing economically, such as Angola, India, Ivory Coast, Chile, Guatemala and several other countries in Latin America, were once colonies that were established by European countries during the fourteen and the fifteen hundreds. Today, for all practical purposes, these nations are independent, although they continue to somewhat depend on the primary colonizers, both economically and culturally. Many of these nations only recently — within the past century — became independent. Most often, the course to independency is through rather unorthodox strategies, for instance, violent revolutionary acts, overthrows of the established governments, and sometimes the arisel of "underground" organizations, often identified as guerillas, such is the case of Mozambique and Angola.

As a result of the wars that the countries had to partake in to gain independency, most of them have been left with rather limited economic and infrastructural capabilities.

The loss of culture in these "Third World Nations", primarily due to the prior governing sources influence, has caused a lack of direction and/or identity that must be dealt with. Perhaps then the term "Third World Nations" which projects a negative image of a "pre-civilized" country in the "bottom of the barrel" should be substituted by a more appropriate term.

The developing countries, in most cases, face tremendous difficulties economically, socially etc. However, they are continuously under development. Quite possibly some integrity could be installed into a term that is used in books and newspapers, to refer to the countries less fortunate than ours, by identifying them as "Developing Nations".

Rebuilding Iraq a slow process

Establishing economic and social stability in Iraq, following the Gulf war, has been far from an easy job for the Iraqi government. After the cease-fire negotiations between the United Nations Security Council and the Iraqi government officials resumed, and the Allied troops retired from Kuwait, Iraq was left to deal with the war aftermath: facing economic and social chaos, while entering the process of rebuilding a structurally devastated country.

Inêz
VIEIRA

Damage to Iraq's infrastructure, as of February 27 of this year, was estimated in $4 billion (US currency). The devastation resulting from the Allied bombing seriously disrupted not only the agricultural production, but also Iraq's food distribution system. Food stocks declined to a record low in the war's immediate aftermath. Allocation of food items declined to less than 40% of the pre-embargo level, in January of 1991. Iraq's price of basic foods has risen at least 1,000 percent since August of 1990, and the private distribution systems have virtually collapsed.

The mandatory economic sanctions imposed on Iraq by the United Nations Security Council on August of 1990, included Iraqi oil and other commodities and on the sale or supply of all goods and products from Irag. Although Iraq's assets abroad were "unfrozen" shortly after the war, the economic embargo has remained active to this day.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Iraq's Ambassador to the UN, Dr. Abdul Amir Al-Anbari, right, talks with Iraqi Foreign Minister Ahmed Hussein.

In addition to the complete infrastructural devastation suffered by Iraq as result of the war and the economic restrictions imposed by the United Nations embargo, Iraq also had to face serious national instability. Fighting among the Iraqi government forces and the Kurdish guerillas reached national security threatening intensity following the Gulf War.

There was widespread uprising against the government of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, in early March of 1990. The main rebellions were in the predominantly Shia South and the Kurdish North. By end-March, the government forces had crushed the South rebellion, and had advanced into Kurdistan, causing a massive exodus of Kurdish refugees.

Allied forces occupied part of the Kurdistan from mid-April to mid-July of 1991, in attempt to create a safe territory for the Kurds. Meanwhile, talks between the opposition and government officials ended in failure. Intense fighting between the two parties at stake resumed in September and October of 1991, and the Iraqi government imposed economic blockade of Kurdistan was reported in December of 1991 to have been partially lifted.

The Iraqi aftermath has been characterized by serious economic as well as social problems. The consequences of this condition, as announced by United Nations officials, could possibly include widespread malnutrition and epidemic diseases, as a result of the scarce food availability and the breakdown of Iraq's structural facilities such as water distribution and sewage systems.

Iraq's immediate aftermath has been dealt with by implementing various strategies such an emergency economic proposal, which consisted of steps to the rationing of food, and incentives for the farmers. In this package, the main goal was to work toward rebuilding of the nation, while keeping in mind the harsh realities facing a post-war nation.

Reconstructing a country that, according to an United Nations report released in mid-March of 1991, "has been pushed back to a pre-industrial age but with all the disabilities of a post-industrial dependency on an intensive use of energy and technology" is certainly going to be a long and hard process. And while the UN embargo remains active and the world's eyes are focused on Saddam Hussein's every move, rebuilding Iraq will be a long term goal, perhaps longer than the ordinarily expected.

Plane crashes near Lagos, 163 soldiers die

By FRANK AIGBOGUN
Associated Press

LAGOS, Nigeria- A military transport plane crashed in a swamp shortly after takeoff from Lagos, and all 163 Army officers and crew on board were killed, the government said in a statement on Sunday.

The crash occurred on Saturday night. The cause was not immediately known, said military officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The Hercules C-130 aircraft disappeared from the radar of Lagos' Murtala Muhammed Airport three minutes after takeoff at 5 p.m. Saturday, the government statement said. The crash site was not discovered until 11 a.m. the following Sunday, after two bodies were found floating in a village outside Lagos.

Most of the passengers aboard the plane were high-ranking officers of a military college located in Taji, a town near Kaduna, who had gone to Lagos for a navy celebration, the sources said.

Hundreds of friends and family members of the deceased passengers gathered at the crash site Sunday. Reporters said that fifteen bodies had been pulled from the wreckage. Four women screamed in grief near the aircraft. One woman rolled in the water, refusing to be consoled by relatives and army officers who said that her husband had died.

The entire nose and one wing of the airplane were completely buried in the swamp. Clothes, shoes and toiletries floated in the water, covering an area of about 2,000 square miles.

An airplane pilot at the scene said that the weather had been clear and visibility good at the time of the crash. He was overheard telling a brigadier-general that he thought it looked like engine failure.

The government statement said that the President of Nigeria, Gen. Ibrahim Babangida, was canceling all engagements for a week, including attending Oct.1 festivities celebrating the independence from Britain, in sympathy with relatives of the crash victims.

Talking, U.S. involvement needed in N. Ireland

Back in the 1960s, in the time of free love, of making peace rather than war, and Woodstock, the United States became involved in one of the biggest disasters in its military History, the Vietnam war. The US' first contingent of troops were sent over as the "police", but the "police" action quickly escalated into a catastrophe. Almost thirty (30) years later, a war erupted in the Persian Gulf, and most feared another Vietnam fiasco, but this time, some attention was payed to History, and the wisdom one can gather from it

Now, let's examine the US government's reasons for involvement of the country in both wars. In the case of Vietnam, the "powers" involved were terrified of the dominance effect. If Vietnam fell in the hands of those "nasty communists", then next would follow Cambodia and other surrounding countries. The US, being the "good guys" that they are just couldn't allow such to happen.

In the case of the Gulf war, "bad ugly Iraq" invaded "poor defenseless Kuwait", and that isn't nice. Oh, and by the way, it had absolutely nothing to do with oil. In either case, was the US acting solely for the good of the invaded countries? No. The US aimed at an outcome that would ensure to be beneficial to them, and with little damage as possible.

The government is very good sometimes at pointing out the "bad guys", as long as there is no harm done. The US government has assumed the role of "police", yet it picks and chases by contradicting standards, who the bad guys really are. Simply ask the US government for their opinion on Iraq, and you should be expecting a long and windy reply. Ask the same of the question concerning Northern Ireland, and you just might hear that "Northern Ireland is England's Vietnam. The situation is such a shame.", and then backs will be turning faster than you can blink. So much for the world "police" role.

I shall now clarify my point at the risk of offending some, but one cannot always please all, and keep in mind that this reflects an individual's opinion. I am neither pro-IRA nor pro-England. I am not pro-colonialization, that was so very popular in the Fourteen and Fifteen hundreds. Welcome to the 20th Century.

The old English do not recognize the Sinn Fein because they are the political wing of the outlawed IRA. The IRA is a terrorist group. It is famous for car bombings, and smashing kneecaps of Catholics who dare to speak out against them. The English emprision members of the IRA in the worst conditions possible, fly helicopters around Belfast with spotlights shining on "target" houses twenty-four hours a day, and incite rebellion with their presence. Each side has its faults.

Activists awakening to a new left in Mass.

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

DEERFIELD, Mass. — In most places, candidates shun the "liberal" label.

In western Massachusetts, a county commissioner proclaims he's a socialist, a Green candidate wins a primary, activists decry war and nuclear power with abandon, and the flame of 1960s radicalism still burns bright.

But some activists say their movement, once unified against the Vietnam conflict and then the Cold war, has fragmented and gone adrift without a clear rallying point - or with too many.

Organizers hope their still powerful, if disunited, grassroots groups can give rise to a new political identity.

"They're looking for a vision," said William Strickland, a leader of Jesse Jackson's Rainbow Coalition, who teaches at the University of Massachusetts. "Because we're living in a visionless time, people are pushing the levers that are at hand - right or wrong."

With Eugene McCarthy and George McGovern ever-fainter memories, those levers are often outside voting booths.

"My voting is with what I do, not from . . . pulling a lever," said Juanita Nelson, a 69-year-old civil rights activist who works a subsistence farm.

"Although most local progressives vote Democratic . . . virtually none feel that either political party fairly or strongly represents their interests or the interests of the common people," said James Perkins, director of the Traprock Peace Center.

Prime-time riot is a hit

Television shows base plot on LA riots

By DEBORAH HASTINGS
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — As if watching Los Angeles burn for real was not enough, here comes a slew of television programs to re-enact the spring riots that devastated this city.

From the teen sex symbols of "Beverly Hills, 90210" to the soap opera mavens on "Knots Landing," seemingly every fictional character on nighttime television has something to say about the non-fictional April violence sparked by the Rodney King beating verdict.

All this prime-time riot writing makes the line between reality and TV even blurrier. Hey, if the vice president thinks fictional Murphy Brown merits a real-life lecture, why shouldn't television producers moralize about setting fire to the nation's second-largest city?

Last week, ABC's "Doogie Howser, M.D." and NBC's "A Different World" chimed in with their takes on the three days of looting and fires that left 53 dead in Los Angeles and nearly $1 billion in property damage.

The make-believe 18-year-old wonderkind doctor on "Doogie" got a lesson Wednesday night in social awareness when riot victims began streaming into his hospital's emergency room.

Sample morality lesson during a conversation between a black orderly and an injured looter:

"Look, this was a long time comin' man. If you beat people down long enough, they're gonna fight back," said the looter.

The orderly's reply: "You're not fighting back. You're just stealing."

On "A Different World," the newly married characters of Whitley and Dwayne saw their L.A. honeymoon interrupted by rioting.

In July, Fox Broadcasting Co.'s "Beverly Hills, 90210" incorporated the carnage into its plot line with Dylan's boss losing his business to fire. The network's other glossy young show, "Melrose Place," wove the racial unrest into its script two weeks ago by having a leading character (a white cab driver) attacked by black gang member in South Central Los Angeles.

The list doesn't stop there.

Yet to come are next month's season openers of NBC's "L.A. Law" and CBS' "Knots Landing," two long-running dramas known for sensationalizing provocative issues of the day.

Leland McKenzie, patriarch of NBC's fictional law firm, will utter, " I watched this city burn once before. I never thought I'd see it again." And office pain-in-the-neck Douglas Brackman will find himself stuck in the rioting and arrested for looting.

"Knots Landing," CBS' 13-year-old nighttime soap opera, plans to make William Devane's character, the slimy Gregory Sumner, head of a corporate task charged with rebuilding the city (not to be confused with the real-life Rebuild L.A., headed by former baseball commissioner Peter Ueberroth).

Barbara Corday, co-executive producer of "Knots Landing," said she sees nothing wrong in using the riots as subplot in her series. In fact, she said, the series is trying to send a message.

of a co-payment policy on accessibility of reproductive care for women, according to Porter. Last year, they sent a letter to Governor Weld urging legislation to provide employer contributions to health plans covering termination of pregnancy.

The report also promoted an increased representation of women on faculty senate committees, councils and University search committees.

"I'm very concerned that women have the opportunity to participate on more faculty and search committees and more representation," Porter said. "We want to see more women, especially on search committees for all types of searches," said Porter. We always pay a lot of attention to that."

The report includes a statement about paying closer attention to female and minority representation according to faculty senate by-laws, in addition to reminding faculty senate committees to nominate members and pay closer attention to women and minority representation.

"In every case, I would like to think there has been an honest attempt [to increase the representation of women], but we have to keep encouraging the administration to pay attention to the balance," Porter said. "It has to be continually watched."

The report also evaluated current status of financial and administrative support. The council met with the University Child Care Director last year regarding the status and funding of University Child Care services.

Letters were also sent to women faculty members encouraging them to become a senator, to serve on a senate committee, consider the position on the Board of Trustees, the Rules Committee or Faculty Senate Presiding Officer.

A letter was also sent to the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs last year, supporting maintenance of Child Care within Housing Services and their current level of funding, as stated in the report.

The report will be presented to the Faculty Senate meeting Oct. 1.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Separate need from fancy and use your resources judiciously. Take any obstacles in stride in order to fulfill your commitments. Friendly chats shine the spotlight on shared interests.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You can do an excellent job if you ignore other people's boasting, complaints and attempts to interfere. The happier you are, the more you will accomplish.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Hold your horses! If you try to make a move now, you could be mowed over by your co-workers or competitors. Open up new lines of communication. Passions intensify tonight.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Become a go-getter and some wonderful opportunities will drop in your lap. Wait a little longer before revealing a family secret to a friend. Keep your temper when dealing with youngsters.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Consolidate your position at work before trying any power plays. Success depends on your doing your homework carefully. Luckily, you are in the right place at the right time!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Material rewards may be a handicap in building a relationship with someone new. Do not try to rush things. Stay within the timetable you previously set. Others may not understand your agenda.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Answers will come more easily if you are willing to listen to others' opinions. Try to get someone to accompany you when mountain climbing or hiking. Be wary of romance on the rebound.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): The emphasis today is on avoiding a showdown. Issuing an ultimatum will only stir up a hornets' nest. Ignore any challenges sent your way. You have plenty to attend to now.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Keep your reactions under control when dealing with unreasonable or boastful people. Safeguard your resources. Half-hearted efforts will bring mixed results.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You can swing the scales in your favor by taking a more humble and constructive approach. Recognize what your talents are truly worth. You have an uncanny knack for ferreting out secrets.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Someone could challenge your ideas. Stand firm and speak up! Influential people will be impressed by your independence and originality. You know exactly how to handle a delicate situation.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 21): Your enterprising spirit and determination bring in much-needed cash. Something you accomplish today lets you begin the weekend happy. Give romance a chance to develop at its own pace.

Divers uncover man's remains

RANGELEY, Maine (AP) — Divers today found a body in Rangeley Lake that is believed to be that of a Massachusetts man presumed drowned when a boat capsized over the weekend.

William Pitko, 32, of Arlington, was one of three men in the 12-foot aluminum boat that swamped Sunday night in wind and rain, said Paul Fournier, spokesman for the state Department of Inland Fisheries and Wildlife.

"Two of the men managed to cling to the boat and holler," Fournier said. "Some people on shore heard them and went out and plucked them out of the water."

Shawn Murphy and Frank Minniti, both in their early 30s and from Arlington, were treated for hypothermia by members of a local rescue unit and did not have to be taken to a hospital, the spokesman said.

Members of the warden service and the Rangeley Fire Department searched the lake for three hours Sunday night. The search team that returned to the lake today included four divers and a pilot. They found the body late this morning.

Students from as far as the University of Connecuticut came to the activity.

take the initiative for coordinating the project.

Although the focus of TEAMS is mainly between students and tutors, there is a great deal of interaction and exchange of ideas between the faculty, school administration and students.

Leo Keating, a senior psychology major and liaison between the schools' faculty and TEAMS, said the schools really encourage the program.

"They are always asking for more people," Keating said.

Tutoring for the project requires at least 60 hours in a semester, about six hours per week plus a two and a half hour seminar each Wednesday night.

"The purpose of the seminar," Bond said, "is to support tutors in dealing with bigger issues presented by the students in schools and in society as a whole."

Cultural diversity is a big emphasis for the tutors, according to Bond. In fact, tutors participating with TEAMS earn three academic credits through the School of Education.

Rachael Knightly, a junior BDIC with a concentration in psychology and education, is a first semester tutor at Kelly Elementary in Holyoke.

Most of the students simply need some extra assistance. "They know what they are doing," Knightly said. "They just want some attention."

Students from all majors are encouraged to tutor with no previous experience necessary.

"The only thing you need to be [to tutor] is open-minded and willing to make new friends," said Jim Solomita, a Continuing Education student.

Political talks breakdown more often than the MBTA in Boston.

The only difference between Northern Ireland and Vietnam is that the troubles have been going on for much too long, and the US has not yet decided to act as Police. Why? Because England is considered to be an ally of the United States, and everyone knows that one does not interfere with allies. Yet, once upon a time Iraq used to be an ally.

It seems that the US government is guilty of cherry picking. Whatever happened to self-determination? Boston Mayor Raymond Flynn, is one of the few in the government who feels that the US has the ability to help mediate the situation in Ireland. I just wish that more saw as he sees.

The troubles have gone on far too long. My appeal is such: Mr. John Major, try and talk to the Sinn Fein and vice-versa. Perhaps there is the need to implement a mediator so that the discussions don't become too heated. Help put an end to this needless violence. There is no reason why people cannot peacefully coexist if the subjects for intrigue are religious, or racial or economic. Isn't it time that we at least, assuming that we are all human enough, put in an effort?

Rugby gets job done in 17-5 win

By STEVE GREGG
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts' rugby team, in fine early-season form despite having a 1-2 record before last Saturday's match against crosstown rival Amherst College, won their second in-league match in as many weeks, 17-5.

UMass tried to keep up their intense against Amherst College, a weak team in comparison to the Minutemen. Amherst opened the scoring early with a try at the two minute mark of the first half, making it 5-0. Their attempt at the conversion kick failed and the score remained 5-0 throughout most of the first half.

UMass finally got on the board when senior captain Dave Lally dove over the end line tying the score at 5-5 with a few minutes left in the half. Senior Larry Scanlon converted a tough kick and UMass led 7-5 at the midway point. The momentum had swung.

The second half was no better for Amherst, as they had to try to come back into a stiff breeze, which had made things tough on the Minutemen in the first half. The inclement weather coupled with the inspired defense of the UMass back line led to an Amherst offense that was by and large ineffective.

UMass began to put the game out of reach when junior wing Jessie Pekkala scored midway through the second half to make it 12-5. Though Scanlon missed the subsequent kick, the UMass defense made sure that a seven point lead was plenty.

Five minutes later, senior fullback Matt Washek iced the game with the Minutemen's third score, making it 17-5, which was how the game ended.

Massachusetts opened up their season with a tough 13-12 loss at the hands of non-conference foe University of Connecticut. Trailing 12-10, UConn cashed in on a 3-point penalty kick with no time on the clock to steal the victory.

Following that heartbreaker, UMass hosted St. Mary's Hospital, a professional travelling rugby team from London, and the result was a 56-0 trouncing by St. Mary's.

Instead of being deflated, the Minutemen used this defeat to motivate themselves for the University of Vermont, their first league opponent. What followed was a 31-0 drubbing with UMass dominating every phase of the game.

Game notes: UMass rugby takes their 2-2 record (2-0 league) to Norwich this Saturday for the third of their five all-important league matches. Kick-off is scheduled for 1 p.m.

In other day's action, the UMass "B-side" won a close game over Amherst by the score of 17-13. The Minutemen were led by Mike McClean who scored three times. UMass also won the "C-side" match by a score of 20-0. The C-side was led by the tough running of Colin McLellan and was aided by "superb officiating".

sure can play. Despite Jon Daly's recent victory, it will be Mickelson and not Daly who will be the next Jack Nicklaus.

It isn't even hoop season, but a few things need to be said:

This years' schedule for the Minutemen is as tough as ever. Coach Cal in the boys, in addition to the return trip they owe to Oklahoma, will open at Florida State, play Depaul at the Centrum, host Southwestern Louisiana, and play Cincinnati at Springfield.

Speaking of Cincinnati, the Bearcats might have a surprise for the public in one Curtis Bostic. The 6' 5" Bostic, who hails from Massachusetts, is an undersized forward who will crash the boards, attack on both ends of the floor, and can leap out of the building. Hmm . . . sounds like someone who played here last year.

Want a '96 Dream Team? Give me a starting five of David Robinson, Shawn Kemp, Larry Johnson, Kendall Gill, and Tim Hardaway and a bench of Shaquille O'Neal, Derrick Coleman, Danny Manning, Billy Owens, Reggie Lewis (he'll be a true star by then), Kenny Anderson (watch him blossom soon), and Randy Livingston as the token collegian.

Dunce of the Week: The whole Celtic brass gets the award for giving us Xavier McDaniel and allowing the Knicks to get Charles Smith and company. McDaniel has knees only my grandma could envy, doesn't play a big mans game, and isn't nearly as good as he was a few years ago. Meanwhile, the Knicks get a vastly talented big man in Smith and insurance in Doc Rivers for Mark Jackson and a couple of draft picks! Dave Gavitt and crew, you should be ashamed!

Obscure Fact of the Week Former Sox farmhand Chico Walker is hitting .304 for the New York Mets. That about does it for this week, next week the column might be Crofts Phone Madness II.

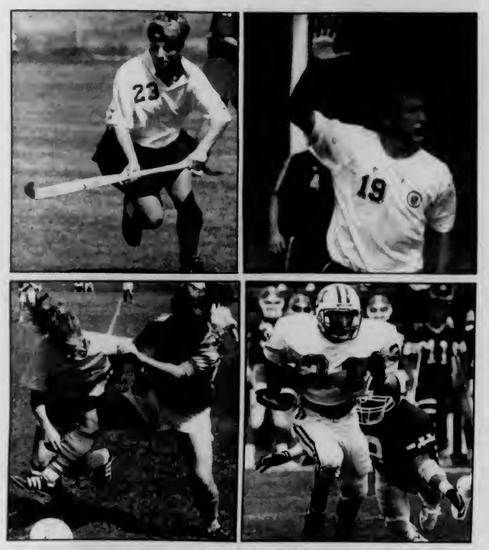
UMass fall sports off to a blazing start



CHRISTOPHER EVANS AND JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

UMass is in the midst of its most successful fall sports season ever, thanks in part to (clockwise from top left): field hockey's Jenn Salisbury, men's soccer's Todd Kylish, women's soccer's Nicole Roberts and football's Don Caparotti.

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Last spring, the University of Massachusetts captured a national audience when the school's basketball team raced to a 30-5 record and an appearance in the NCAA Sweet Sixteen. The question lingering this year was, "What can UMass do for an encore?"

Try 40-4-1.

That's the combined record of every fall team after last weekend's events. Teams such as water polo, women's track and field hockey may not gain as much attention as basketball does, but those teams have helped UMass rocket to one of the school's fastest starts ever. Even more remarkable is the fact that all of this is being accomplished in spite of a huge shakeup in the athletic department.

The UMass sports program is running well despite a vacancy in the athletic director's position and the heat of a House Post Audit and Oversight Committee probe. Interim athletic director Glenn Wong said he is overjoyed that the sports department has posted such impressive numbers.

"I'm very pleased with how the teams are doing on the field," said Wong. "You really have to give all the credit to the student-athletes and the coaches.

"That was my first priority when I took this job, to try to get people to emphasize the kids, that's something I've been doing all along," he said. "It's not an accident that all of the teams we've put out there have done well. I've always said we've got a lot of good coaches here."

The three women's sports, field hockey, soccer, and cross country, have remained undefeated, amassing a combined 18-0. Both women's soccer (7-0) and field hockey (8-0) are currently fifth in the nation, and barring catastrophe, both teams will be in the NCAA Tournament in November. In that event, it would be soccer's 10th appearence and field hockey's 11th in the last 11 years,.

Women's cross country found out Monday that they cracked the top 25 in their sport for the first time in ages, right at No. 25.

"Obviously everyone loves a winning program," said women's cross country coach Julie LaFreniere. "It feels real good to be part of a winning atmosphere."

The men's teams have held up their end of the bargain, looking impressive early and keeping their postseason options open. The men's soccer team (5-1-1) tied national contender Rutgers University 2-2 over the weekend, and come NCAA Tournament time, there is a chance it could be UMass and not Rutgers who represents the Atlantic 10.

The UMass football team, while not appearing to be as strong as 1988 or 1990 teams which won the Yankee Conference, could surprise some folks. A 2-1 start out of the gate and an upcoming trip to Rhode Island could set up quite a scenario for Homecoming.

"Tailgating's back, and it would be super to come into the Homecoming game [Oct. 24 against Villanova] with a 3-1 record," Wong said. "We lost about 5,000 people to last weekend's [poor] weather, but hopefully everything will work out."

Not to be overlooked is the tremendous play of the water polo team, probably the most obscure team on campus. Russ Yarworth's squad is 12-1 after a 5-win weekend, with their only loss at the hands of the best team in the East, Slippery Rock (PA.).

The water polo team must finish in the top two in the East region to advance to

Women's X-C remains unbeaten

Liljeblad leads 25th ranked Minutewomen to victory

By JASON NASH
Collegian Correspondent

Ask any University of Massachusetts fan which fall sports team has truly dominated every minute of play this season and it is doubtful many will guess correctly. The right answer? Women's cross country.

Saturday in Vermont, the UMass team continued this domination by crushing Vermont and Boston University increasing their record to 3-0. The win places the women at number one in the Atlantic 10 and number two overall in New England.

Junior Kelly Liljeblad continued her reign of terror upon all competitors by finishing first in the 3.1 mile course with a time of 17:47. Some simpled division will tell you how impressive her mile times were.

"Kelly was really impressive," said Coach Julie LaFreniere. "She took the first two miles easier than normal, and remained fairly close with Vermonts best runner. The last mile was all uphill and Kelly really poured it on."

In UMass' two through five spots were junior Kim Liljeblad (fifth) senior captains Becky Johnson (sixth), and Mo Meldrim (seventh) and sophomore Julie Morough (eighth). Incredibly, this pack of four finished with only 32 seconds between them.

"Those four did a great job and really held tight the whole race," said LaFreniere. "Keeping a tight pack is the key to winning any race. Believe it or not I would like to get that time to around 20 seconds by the start of the championships."

LaFreniere also said she was pleased with the performance of Morough who she knew "had a good race in her."

While coming off their biggest win in six years against B.C. last week, this meet was a cooldown for UMass.

"The girls were tired and had a long week," said LaFreniere. "This meet was a good break for us, especially after such a big win last weekend."

UMass takes this weekend off and then wraps up their dual meet season at home on October 10 with number three ranked Connecticut.

LaFreniere added, "Even though we don't have a meet this weekend, we're coming upon our highest mileage week of the season.

We're really going to have to step it up a notch to get ready for Connecticut."

Simon can't lift X-C to victory

Men drop contest to Vermont, Boston University

By GWENDOLYN McLAURIN
Collegian Staff

Despite another strong performance by senior Matt Simon, the University of Massachusetts men's cross country team lost to Vermont and Boston University, on Saturday.

For his seventh place performance, Simon was named Atlantic 10 Performer of the Week. Simon ran the course in 25 minutes and 2 seconds, one minute faster then his performance a week earlier. Simon has been the top UMass finisher in both of meets.

In spite of Simon's noteworthy achievement, the Minutemen placed third out of the three teams that competed. It wasn't so much that they ran a bad meet as it was they were up against two strong teams.

"I would have been much happier if we had won, but I don't think we had a bad day," explained Coach Ken O'Brien.

Boston University was ranked 36th in the country going into the meet this weekend and no there is doubt they improved their position with this decisive win. They finished in the NCAA Top 15 last year and three of their top five runners returned from last season, so they were expected to dominate the meet.

The competition between Vermont and UMass was fierce as shown by the scant four-point win by the Catamounts. Vermont's strength is in their top runners as exhibited by those top runners placing third and fourth respectively. But that is where Vermont stops and UMass begins. The strength of the UMass team is their depth. UMass had seven runners complete the course before Vermont's fourth place runner finished.

As usual, Pat Reed, Craig Cormier, Kevin Greenhalgh and Brian Cox along with Simon were UMass's strongest runners all finishing in the top fifteen. This week's suprise came from two young runners, Erik Andelman and Tim Boilard. Andelman, a sophomore competing in his first meet of the year, finished 12th, while Boilard, a freshman who was competing in the first college meet of his career, finished an impressive 16th.

UMass is now looking forward to their next meet, the Paul Short Invitational at Lehigh University on October 10th.

Ramblings on the world of sports action

Just some personal thoughts about sports in general:

I don't know if anyone else is getting deathly tired of the fat guy that does football commercials/promos for CBS but I know that the sight of him is just gnawing at me.

This clown, whom I'll call Lumpy, is a fat, ugly, chromosome missing Neanderthal, who simply says something about his love for football and the upcoming CBS game. Who cares about this crumb and his opinions?

Jeff
CROFTS

Can't CBS come up with something better than this? This is sad! Whoever hired Lumpy should immediately be fired and forced to eternally watch reruns of The Land of the Lost.

Superbowl Prediction: Steelers 23 Eagles 17. I know the Steelers got it handed it to them by the Packers, but one week does not a season make!

Neil O'Donnell will lead the tough offense, throwing to Jeff Graham, the speedy Dwight Stone, and big tight end Eric Green. Running backs Barry Foster and Merrill Hoge can move the chains with their bruising running styles.

Rod Woodson had a terrible game against the Pack, but he is the defensive leader. As a whole, the defensive squad is a mobile, ball hawking unit that can play with anyone.

I just got my new cleats in the mail, so I'm going to Foxboro in hopes of making the Pats as a wide receiver. I think I have a chance with my 6.9 speed in the 40, and mitts so sure they call me the second coming of Roberto "The Hands of Stone" Duran.

If that doesn't work out, I'll bulk up a few pounds and try offensive line. The Pats are a sad team, an unclever mix of over-the-hill veterans and no-talent youngsters.

Whatever happened to Blackjack Mulligan, Enos Cabell, Perry Moss, and Vegas Ferguson?

I'm not a big golf fan, but this Phil Mickelson kid

Rethinking Native America

Activist says a change of perception is needed

By CARA LEE BIRCH
Collegian Correspondent

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Native American activist Winona LaDuke

Famed Native American activist Winona LaDuke told a packed Campus Center Auditorium last night that Americans need to change the way they think about indigenous people and indigenous values.

Most Americans can name only three to four of the nations of Native American people, she said, therefore "they know nothing about indigenous values." There are are over 700 Native communities, she added. Washington state alone, LaDuke said, has 14, 80 tribes live in California, and 200 in Alaska. North of the Canada's 50th parallel, she continued, 85 to 90 percent of the population is Native.

LaDuke, president of the Indigenous Women's Network and steering committee representative to the International Council of Indigenous Women, lectured on the effects of colonialism and industrial thinking from a Native American perspective.

A member of the Bear Clan, the largest Native American population in North America, who has been involved in federal land rights lawsuits, LaDuke lives in the James Bay area in Northern Canada.

LaDuke said her experience has been that Native people have different perceptions of reality and values. For example, she said, "natural law is preeminent." LaDuke said Native communities believe they are the only sustainable people because they actually put everything back into the environment that they take out of it.

Native people, she said, believe most natural things, such as tides, the moon, seasons and time, are cyclical. LaDuke contrasted cyclical thinking and the preeminence of natural law with the Eurocentric industrial way of thinking. Within the industrial mode of thinking, she said, people believe man is dominant over nature. LaDuke dates this perception back to Columbus' 1492 invasion of the Americas.

LaDuke went on to say that capitalism uses labor, capital, and resources for the purposes of accumulation. The history of the United States has been one of constant accumulation, she said.

According to LaDuke, there is a systematic link between the wealth of the United States and the underdevelopment of indigenous communities throughout the world. For example, she said, one group of indigenous people has been exterminated in

Ex-fiancee guns down three, self

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

CHICOPEE, Mass. — An estranged lover burst into his ex-finacee's home with a shotgun and killed three people, including an 8-year-old boy, before fatally shooting himself in the head, authorities said.

But they said the attacker's ex-fiancee, fearing threats he made the previous evening, had left the apartment and was out at the time. And the alleged attacker was under court order to stay away.

"This is just one more chilling situation involving domestic violence," District Attorney William Bennett said during a news conference at the Chicopee Police Department. "Domestic violence affects every ethnic group, every neighborhood."

The victims were identified as Keith Dupont, 3, who lived in the apartment, Katrina Trombly, 22, and her boyfriend, Jesse Mitchell, 20, Authorities did not immediately have the hometowns of Trombly and Mitchell.

The three were killed by Daniel Bessonette, 26, of Holyoke, whose body was found in the kitchen with a head wound.

The 8-year-old was the son of the intended target, Karen Dupont, and Trombly was her sister, authorities said. Another 4-year-old child of Dupont and a 1-year-old child of Trombly were in the apartment but escaped unharmed.

Bennett also said authorities suspect that Trombly was pregnant. Officials began autopsies of the victims Tuesday, according to a spokeswoman for the Hampden County medical examiner. There were no immediate

Students reporting rise in sexual harassment

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

There is an increased level of sexual harassment between peers at the University of Massachusetts, according to a recent report on the impact of the University's sexual harassment policy.

The Student Affairs Research and Evaluation Office concluded in the report that the University needs to "continuously educate the student body and extend its sexual harassment policy to explicitly prohibit peer harassment."

The telephone surveys, sponsored by the Office of Human Relations, were conducted last March, April and May by Project Pulse and Student Affairs Research, Information and Systems.

"It doesn't surprise me," said the assistant ombudsperson, Mary Wardwell. "A greater awareness, we hope, will lead to increased reporting of incidents of sexual harassment."

During an interview last spring, Everywoman's Center Director Carol Wallace said more students are feeling a higher level of confidence.

"If the report is made, people will take that seriously," Wallace said. "It's important for students to feel they can speak to someone and I think more are feeling they can talk about it."

The Project Pulse survey found the majority of women surveyed were aware that sexual harassment is illegal, but only two-fifths were aware that UMass has a policy which prohibits sexual harassment.

Two-thirds of the women reported that they had personally experienced students "making unwanted physical contact" with them. Thirty-four percent reported being sexually harassed by another student.

Only 62 percent reported awareness of the University's policy that specifically prohibits sexual harassment. After students were informed that UMass has a grievance procedure for sexual harassment, a little over one-third of the students said they were aware of it.

The report continued to state that women undergraduates reporting awareness of the illegality of sexual harassment, the existence of the University policy, and the existence of a grievance policy do not greatly differ from 1989 figures.

"A vast majority of sexual harassment probably goes unreported," said Wardwell.

Wardwell suggested students may not be "sufficiently aware" they can pursue instances of sexual harassment.

"Many may not even be aware that certain behavior in

Two helicopters collide, four die as one crashes

By JOHN F. BONFATTI
Associated Press

NIAGARA FALLS, Ontario — Two helicopters carrying sightseers collided near Horseshoe Falls on Tuesday, and one plunged into an embankment, killing all four people aboard, officials said.

The second helicopter managed to land at a nearby theme park.

Scott Hughes, manager of Rainbow Helicopters Inc. in Niagara Falls, N.Y., said the helicopter that crashed belonged to his company and had four people aboard, three passengers and a pilot. Fire Chief Dave Kemp said all four died.

The wreck "was just a twisted mess with a hand and a foot coming out of it," said Bobby Moss, a tourist from Atlanta who was one of the first people on the scene.

"As I was running over, I had to watch and dodge the debris falling from the helicopter," he said.

The collision occurred shortly after lunchtime. First reports said the crippled helicopter fell into the Niagara River gorge, but authorities later said it hit a nearby embankment. Police Inspector Bill Bowie said the other landed under its own power at the nearby Marineland and Game Farm.

"It was an emergency landing, but everyone left the aircraft in an upright position," Constable John Gayder of the Niagara Parks Police said. "Everyone appeared to be OK."

Frits Wiarda, 31, a sightseer from Delft, the Netherlands, said he was standing by a railing overlooking the falls when "I heard a big bang."

"I looked up in the sky and I saw one helicopter flying away and the red one come tumbling down," Wiarda said. "My first reaction was "Do I want to make a photograph? And then I realized I was pretty close to it, so I started running away from it. And I looked up and there was debris everywhere."

Magic to play again

Johnson returns to Lakers this season

By JOHN NADEL
Associated Press

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — Unable to leave the game he loves even to fight for his life, Magic Johnson returned to pro basketball Tuesday.

Less than a year after retiring because he had contracted the AIDS virus, Johnson announced that he will play again this season for the Los Angeles Lakers and said it was only natural.

"That court is where I belong, no matter what happens," Johnson said, speaking in the same room where he bade his sad, shocking goodbye last Nov. 7.

"I'm playing again," he beamed. "Yeaaaa. Finally."

He'll be back, wearing No. 32, flashing that big smile and playing the game as only Magic can.

"It's time to go back to work, it's time to have some fun." Johnson said. "I think the positives outweigh all the risks. That's not saying there are no risks, because like itself is a risk. But being out there, I won't be worried about that. If I was concerned about that, I'd still be retired."

The mood this time was decidedly different from that retirement announcement 327 days ago.

"This is a lot more relaxed... better," said Johnson. "It was much tougher then because I was having to say goodbye."

Johnson's wife, Cookie, said she was behind his decision to return "totally... 100 percent."

Since Johnson announced his retirement, there had been a steady stream of speculation and controversy about his future, mixed with his triumphant appearances in the NBA All-Star Game in February and the Olympics this summer. It was that

UMass Police Log

Compiled by Michael Day

Recent incidents recorded by the University's Department of Public Safety.

• A man walked into a sliding glass door on the third-floor balcony of Dickinson Residence Hall on Monday evening, suffering lacerations to his foot, calf and hand. The victim, who apparently didn't realize the door was shut, was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital by ambulance, police said.

• University Police reported extensive damage to two casement windows in the the Duda Building on Monday, at 3:45 p.m. Police believe there was an attempted break-in to the building, resulting in $550 damage to the windows.

• A woman reported damage to her convertible car top on Monday evening. According to police, the woman said her convertible top had been ripped, resulting in causing $2700 worth of damage.

• Two mountain bikes were reported stolen to police on Monday. A locked bicycle worth $550 was stolen from a bike rack in front of Kennedy Residence Hall at 11:45 a.m. Another man reported the theft of his bike from Thoreau Residence Hall. The bicycle, worth $450, was locked to a door frame when it was stolen.

• Police received a report of a stolen car early Monday afternoon. The car, parked in Lot 33, was later reported to have been taken by a friend.

Milk isn't for breakfast anymore

By LAURA REHRMANN
Associated Press

BALTIMORE — Cookies and milk may never be the same.

Child expert, Dr. Benjamin Spock, who long advocated drinking cow's milk, is joining several other doctors in questioning its nutritional value and the possible harm it can cause some children.

"Parents have been doing their duty as they were taught by medicine and dietetics and forcing milk (on their children). We have to get parents over that," Spock said in a telephone interview Monday.

Spock was scheduled to appear today at a news conference on children and milk consumption at Boston's Park Plaza Hotel.

Also scheduled to speak were Dr. Frank A. Oski, director of pediatrics at John Hopkins University, and Dr. Neal Barnard, president of the Physicians Committee for Responsible Medicine, a nonprofit association of 2,000 doctors that promotes preventive medicine and alternatives to animal research.

Oski, who wrote a book in 1977 called "Don't Drink Your Milk," said at a news conference Monday in Baltimore that milk's reputation as a calcium-rich food that will help children grow big and strong is largely undeserved. Other foods, such as kale, broccoli or fish, provide more calcium without the fat in milk, he said.

"There is nothing unique about milk, regarding its nutritional benefits, that should make you want to drink it," he said.

"There's no reason for us to spend lots of money to give milk to kids when it doesn't really do them any good."

The American Academy of Pediatrics recommended earlier this year against giving whole milk to infants during the first year because it may cause iron deficiency

The American University of Paris is a four-year liberal arts college in Paris welcoming visiting students.

Majors in: Art History, Comparative Literature, Computer Science, European Studies, French Studies, International Affairs, International Business Administration, International Economics, and Fine Arts at Parsons School of Design.

Two programs especially designed for visiting students:

The Institute for French Studies in Paris (IFSP) offers students with strong French language proficiency the chance to combine their studies at AUP with courses at the Institut d'Etudes Sociales, Institut National des Langues et Civilisations Orientales, Université de Paris IV–Sorbonne, and Institut d'Etudes Politiques ('Sciences-Po').

The Program in European Affairs (PEA) allows students to select Europe-focused courses from three of our majors and to integrate them through an on-going seminar. Year-long students may qualify for international affairs internships in their second semester.

• 1000 students from 70 different countries.
• 40% U.S. citizens, 14% French.
• In 1991-92, 12% visiting students.
• Housing is guaranteed.

Full college credit summer courses:
• Three-week French immersion.
• Six-week regular summer session.

Comm prof to go abroad

Invited to lecture in Europe for the year

Donal A. Carbaugh, associate professor of communication at the University of Massachusetts, is spending the academic year abroad after receiving an invitation to lecture in England this fall and a Fulbright to lecture in Finland for the spring.

In England, Carbaugh will be a visiting senior lecturer at Oxford University and take part in a communications study group with European scholars. In addition, he will speak at a November conference in Finland, titled, "The Competent Intercultural Communicator."

Carbaugh will be in Finland from January through July, conducting a seminar series at the University of Tampere and the University of Jyvaskyla. He will also help the University of Tampere establish a program to study intercultural communication.

Carbaugh will also conduct research on the relationship between communication and cultural identity and differences in the ways Americans and Finns communicate.

"The sense of who a people are, what they do, and the way they live, is shown in their language," said Carbaugh. "Through communication, people develop a sense of who they are and the way they are supposed to act.

"In America, individuality is stressed. Sayings like, 'I've got to get myself together' create a sense of the person for Americans," said Carbaugh. "Also, the concept that land is something to use is also very American. Finns are deeply rooted to their forests and lakes. I want to look at the way Finns deal with land and development."

The Fulbright program awards about 5,000 grants each year to American students, teachers and scholars to study, teach and conduct research in more than 130 foreign countries.

Prank calls on increase, most of victims female

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts police say they have been deluged with a high amount of complaints this semester from students receiving prank calls.

The calls are solicitous in nature, police said, and can be potentially dangerous to unsuspecting students.

Detective Mike Grabiac of the Department of Public Safety believes students are very concerned with the increase of prank calls. He is recording the frequency of all prank calls in order to track down the perpetrators.

"We are getting hammered with the number of calls," said Grabiac.

Detective Joanne O'Connor says the majority of complaints are coming from female students. The influx of complaints have piled up since the return of students this semester.

"We are receiving more and more reports," said O'Connor.

O'Connor offered some specific examples to illustrate the severity of the problem.

"Students are receiving hang up calls, which can be very annoying. There is also the issue of voice mail hacking," said O'Connor.

Voice mail "hacking" involves callers figuring out students 5-12 digit passwords in order to bypass the answering system and get their call through directly, according to O'Connor.

"The hackers try to gain access to a student password, and often times choose simple password codes," said O'Connor.

The problem of voice mail hacking has caused a lot of headaches for students, said O'Connor.

With assistance from the telecommunications office, the police department is trying to devise ways to make voice mail hacking more difficult.

Usually the callers are male and call between the hours of 1 a.m. and 6 a.m. when most students are asleep and disoriented, police say.

"We are getting hammered with the number of calls"
Detective Mike Grabiac

O'Connor says that their method of operation is often with the enticement of money.

"The caller states that he has inherited a large sum of money and uses this as a ploy to deceive the unsuspecting student," she said. "The caller claims to live in the eastern part of the state and tries to persuade the student to divulge personal information about themselves and others."

O'Connor also mentioned another element that has surfaced on campus. Students are receiving calls from unidentified callers who claim they represent Masters & Johnson and are conducting a survey on sex.

"The callers pretend to be conducting a survey, a long survey and a short one. They entice the unsuspecting student with a cash reward depending on length of the survey. The caller asks very personal questions, often inquiring about personal habits, names and phone numbers. The caller tries to persuade the student who in turn refuses to answer and hangs up," said O'Connor.

O'Connor urges students who may receive prank calls of this nature to not engage in a conversation and report the call immediately to the UMass campus police.

"We are open and accessible to students at any given time, we also need your cooperation and input and help the community," said O'Connor.

Bike parking violations abound

Illegally parked bikes being chained, owners fined

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

Bicycles parked on handicap ramps, stairways, corridors and doors are posing problems for the handicapped students and making potential emergency building evacuations difficult if not impossible, said a fire safety officer.

Fire Safety Officer Donald Erickson said, "There has been an explosion in the number of bikes on campus and not enough bike racks for students to park their bikes."

He said the buildings that have had the most bike parking violations are Hasbrouck Laboratory, Morrill Science Center, Guinness Engineering, Tobin Hall, Campus Center and Goodell Building.

Matt Forman, a senior economics major, said his illegally parked bike was chained to the handicap rail by the maintenance staff in the Campus Center. "I waited around for 20 minutes wondering who put the chain on my bike and then I had to pay a $5 fine to have the maintenance staff take it off."

Forrest Davies, senior building services manager, said the maintenance staff chains the bikes and fines the students to deter them from continuing to park their bikes illegally. "It is better to charge the students a small fine than to cut the $20 or $30 locks," he said.

Erickson said if a bike is found parked in an unsafe area, excluding the Campus Center, the Environmental Health and Safety staff leave reminder notices on it. "The notice will say the bike is illegally parked and give a reason why," he said.

According to Erickson, as a last resort bikes are removed and must be reclaimed from the University Police. "[Environmental Health and Safety] remove bikes that they have seen illegally parked three or four times or bikes that are a safety hazard."

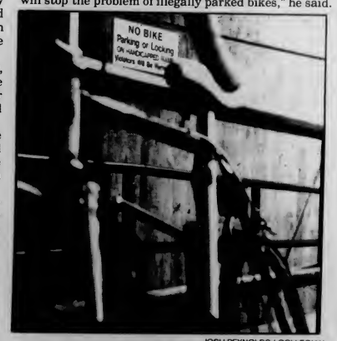
Erickson said he has received several complaints from handicapped students, janitors and the elderly. "People who walk with canes or have heart problems need to use the handrails to get down the ramps and they are unable to do so because the bikes are obstructing their path."

Madeline Peters, assistant director of Disabled Services, said handicap students sometimes cannot get to classes or inside the Campus Center because of the illegally parked bikes. "The students are not thinking about what the consequences are for handicap students who's only access to buildings is the ramps."

She said handicap students were dropped off by the special transportation van and then found themselves stranded because they couldn't get in the building. "The student wouldn't be able to get to a phone to call anyone and the van wouldn't be scheduled to come back for the student until his or her class was over."

Erickson said the Physical Plant is responsible for getting the bike racks for the academic buildings. "It is a matter of the Physical Plant setting priorities and preparing a budget for the academic buildings." He said the budget probably wouldn't happen this year.

Davies said he has ordered three sets of bike racks for the Campus Center. "Hopefully the no parking signs the maintenance staff is going to put up and the new racks will stop the problem of illegally parked bikes," he said.



JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN
Campus officials are taking action against illegally parked bikes, like this one. Fines and chains are being used to keep buildings accessible.

Newman seeks telephone help

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

The Newman Center wants to raise $140,000 in three weeks and to do that, it needs 450 volunteers to staff its annual Phon-a-Thon, according to Phon-a-thon Director Judith Smith.

"It costs about $400,000 to keep the Newman Center open all year. [The Phon-a-Thon] keeps the place open," Smith said. "Anyone who wants to volunteer is more than welcome. Most of the kids have a good time. They come back year after year. We get great help from fraternities and sororities."

Students will be contacting more than 20,000 Catholic Alumni and Catholic students' parents from Oct. 4 to Oct. 22. Smith also needs secretarial help. Volunteers can work Sunday through Thursday from 5:30 p.m. to 9:30 p.m.

"We give them [the volunteers] meal vouchers for the cafeteria. They can get what [food] they want," Smith said. "I have sign-up sheets in the Newman Center. They would be of great help, if they signed up for hours."

In addition to every participant receiving a water bottle, students can win money. The student who brings in the most pledges or the largest amount of money will be awarded $50. The team or group that collects the most money will win $100 and, $250 will go to the fraternity or sorority that collects the largest sum of money.

Because the Center receives no money from the University or the state, the Phon-a-Thon accounts for one-third of the center's annual income. The first Phon-a-Thon was in 1986.

"We raised about $20,000 [in 1986]. We were ecstatic. We thought it was marvelous," Smith said.

Last year the group raised $135,308.

The Center has a study area, a library, and a cafeteria. It also holds some University classes. In addition to it having Catholic masses, it has held Russian Orthodox services, along with Episcopalian, Methodist and Mormon rites.

fact constitutes sexual harassment," said Wardwell. I think some people may be afraid to report because of the possibility of retaliation."

Slightly less than one-fifth of the women reported that they had followed the Anita Hill/Clarence Thomas Hearings "very closely," and 36.4 percent said they thought Anita Hill was telling the truth.

"I think a lot of people are reporting now because of the Clarence Thomas hearings," said Wardwell.

Four-fifths of the surveyed women reported "sometimes or often" seeing or hearing other students making negative remarks about females or telling jokes that "put down" womens. One-fifth of the women reported this behavior from course instructors or University staff members.

Two-thirds of the women reported "students making unwanted physical contact" with them. Almost one-quarter reported they had experienced students asking them "for sexual favors in return for other favors."

"Clearly many women are experiencing behaviors which often are defined as "sexual harassment," but they are not defining the behaviors as such," the Project Pulse report stated.

Fifteen percent of the women surveyed reported experiencing at least one of the following behaviors by University staff members: sexual remarks about their bodies or sexual activities, feeling tense by pressure for sexual activity, unwanted physical contact or explicit unwanted sexual advances.

Forty-one percent said they would "very likely" report an incident of sexual harassment if they experienced it. A little more than three-fifths said that "fear of retaliation" would discourage them slightly from reporting. More than half said embarrassment or shame would discourage them from reporting.

Only 12 percent said they had confidence in the University's ability to respond effectively to sexual harassment.

Wardwell encourages women to seek assistance with a problem at the Ombuds Office, who hears grievance cases.

"We are here to help anyone with a University related problem. I encourage women to report incidents of harassment and not hope it will just go away," said Wardwell.

Brazil every year since 1900 and 70 percent of all indigenous peoples' lands are being annexed by the military industrial complex.

LaDuke said that George Bush's energy and industrial policy is based on the exploitation of indigenous land and that 72 percent of all wars in the world are fought between the state and indigenous nations.

LaDuke contended that all nuclear testing has been done on Native American lands, the reason being that two-thirds of the resources needed for nuclear development, such as uranium, is mined from Native land. On the reservations where uranium is mined, she said, birth defects are eight times higher than the national average.

She concluded with the fact that even 500 years later, indigenous peoples still survive through a continental holocaust. The common myth "there is no Indian," LaDuke said, attempts to say that a crime hasn't been committed.

LaDuke reminded the audience that 50 million indigenous peoples were slaughtered in an unprecedented genocide, and she challenged them to take responsibility for these crimes.

What 'in the best interests of the child' should mean

Last Friday, 12-year-old Gregory Kingsley was granted a "divorce" from his biological mother by a Florida circuit judge, paving the way for his foster parents to adopt him. It is a case that touches upon the 1992 catch-all, "family values," and raises two essential questions: one, will this case establish a legal precedent for the welfare of abused and neglected children? and two, why did this case ever have to go to trial?

When I wrote my first column this year, I thought it would be the only one that was adoption-related, but after seeing this case in the papers, I knew I had to write about it.

Luke
ERICKSON

The primary factor to consider is parenthood: what is it, exactly? Is it the biological conception of life? Is it merely instinct? Or is it a creation of society?

The answer to all of these questions is yes. The argument is to what degree each concept plays in the overall picture. I believe parenthood is psychological above all else. It is the caring and nurturing of a child that satisfies both physical and emotional needs.

My mother used to quote from Dr. Spock's "Baby and Child Care" (The "directions" in the movie "Raising Arizona") saying that the love and care that a baby receives in the first six months of life will influence him or her for the rest of his or her life.

Gregory Kingsley's mother neglected him for most of the first nine years of his life. It was a blessing in disguise when she placed him into the foster care system because she felt she could no longer pay the bills. Gregory was placed with a foster family that loves him and is willing and able to give him the kind of support he needs. Now, they are his parents.

Gregory Kingsley's father surrendered his parental rights earlier this year when Gregory made it known that he wanted his foster parents to adopt him. He may have seen it as an opportunity to escape, or he may have realized it was in Gregory's best interest; either way, it was the right choice.

It is sad that Gregory's mother could not realize that fact. Instead, she chose to fight; not for her son, but for her own salvation as a failed parent. Gregory was a pawn in her game of "I'm Putting My Life Together Again." Fortunately, Gregory was able to leave the table. Sadly, his two brothers are still with his biological mother.

What if Gregory Kingsley had grown up in Massachusetts? Well, chances are his case would have been brought to trial by the Department of Social Services on his behalf (Gregory Kingsley retained his own attorney and filed suit himself, which is what makes his case unique) but he would have been at the mercy of judges that are untrained in child psychology.

Case in point: A man, convicted of assaulting his wife and two daughters, sues to retain custody of his children. He has been granted a divorce from his wife. The children have been in foster care for nearly two years. The judge awards him custody, citing his good behavior in jail (not too many women and children in there to knock around, your honor ?) and the fact that the girls called him 'Daddy' when they saw him in court (and the lawyers, and the bailiff, and the social worker...or any adult male, according to the girls' foster mother). Six months later he's arrested and convicted for raping his two daughters. The foster mother who pleaded against him could only hang her head and cry. Sometimes my mother's emotions betray her stoic nature.

I am not advocating that every parent who places his or her child into foster care is an unfit parent, or that every child who seeks to have parental rights terminated (the correct term - not 'divorce') should win. I do advocate that every case should be looked at individually, before a panel of social workers, with a judge acting as an arbitrator, not God. It's about time that "in the best interests of the child" meant exactly that.

The land of the free — a blurry piece of history?

The words are brewing underneath your skin, eating away at your stomach. Filled with passion and purpose they hold your heart in a tight embrace. They're crawling up your throat, trying to grasp at your tongue, but no sound is made. Your blood is boiling, the frustration of silence seeping out your pores.

Your mind is doing violent somersaults trying to figure out why no sound comes and your eyes are swelling as if the words were trying to be spoken through your tears. The anger inside you serges through your throat as you make one last effort for sound — then you realize the government is clenching your vocal chords in its iron fist.

E.C.
THOMAS

This, to me, is what it would be like to not have freedom of speech. I could never fathom how people governed by dictatorships handled that indisputable silence, but I was always thankful for our Constitution preventing me from finding out.

This country would be nothing without freedom of speech; it is the pavement on which our nation was built; it is what America stands for. However, lately it seems the "land of the free" is nothing but a piece of blurry history.

President Bush recently made a visit to the Missouri Southern State College campus. It was a public appearance, sponsored by the Young Republicans, in which all were invited, including the Democrats.

Upon entry to the rally, the Clinton supporters, one by one were approached by officers from the Missouri State Highway Patrol. They were each told they would have to move their "protest" to another area. The officers referred to this area as the "designated protest area"; although no formal protest had been organized. "They were serious about it. We were given no choice", the president of the Young Democrats was quoted as saying in the Joplin Globe [Sept.13].

The supporters were led to this area (30 square feet marked off by crime-scene tape and in no real proximity of the rally), and held by the watchful eye of police and secret service men; they weren't even allowed to go to their cars or their classes. They were told that if they crossed over the line of segregation, they would be arrested.

The Democrats repeatedly asked for the reasons why they were being detained, but the officers had none, they were just following orders.

Meanwhile on the grounds of the rally, student journalists were being harassed by police and service men. "I saw two women from NOW arguing with this officer at the protest area. Since I had no telephoto lens I had to get pretty close," one student said.

"This officer turned to me and asked, 'Who are you? Let me see your press pass.' I told him I was a student. He physically grabbed me and the camera and attempted to take [it] away. I refused to let him do it."

At the metal detectors Clinton signage was being confiscated and those now entering with any Clinton paraphernalia were being verbally harassed and then promptly sequestered with the others.

When I was younger the above was explained to me as the meaning of communism. I was enraged when I heard about this story. This wasn't just some excited Republican public taking away Democratic signage, but an organized government effort.

Who gave them these rights of authority? Under what law would the students be arrested? Trespassing — on public property? Property that these students pay for? They weren't even acting in a disorderly or disruptive manner; how threatening could they have been? All they held were their beliefs, not baseball bats or guns — just the ammunition of their values.

America is fast becoming the land of intolerance and distortion. The foundation on which our country was built is disintegrating into the earth and becoming the bottom layers of the ocean floor. We might as well rip up the Constitution and use it as fertilizer. It would seem as if the government has already torn up the Bill of Rights and used it as kindling to start a fire. After all, the flames of their power have already burnt down one city.

First they interfere with our skin pigmentation, then our ovaries, then our hormones — now its everyone's vocal chords? Our government might as well enroll themselves in Harvard Medical School to become certified surgeons. What's next, our minds? — or have they already gotten to that, and we just don't know about it yet?

Hey, we want to talk about sex

We, the Peer Sex Educators (PSEs) at UMass, would like to let everyone know that we are here and we like to talk about sex! We'll come to your dorm, sorority, fraternity, club meeting or anything else and let you pick a workshop for us to give.

We'll help you to "Be a Better Lover."

We'll discuss safer sex and condom use as well as HIV, AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases in a comfortable, non-threatening manner.

We'll allow you to ask questions both anonymously and otherwise.

We'll help you to understand why communication is so important with your partner.

We're not homophobic or heterosexist.

We're Republicans, Democrats, socialists, female, male, gay, straight and bisexual. We're pre-med, English, engineering, psychology, sociology and math majors. We're here and we're just like you!

If you are interested in seeing a workshop, sponsoring one or just want to find out more information, contact Myra Edelstein at University Health Services or speak to any PSE you can find. We're always willing to talk about sex.

Read me, please

Look, it's like this: all of your letters are great, sometimes a little bizarre, but great nonetheless. And you know we love getting mail and reading all of them — but, hey, this is the deal — we can't print any of them unless your name, address and phone number are on the page somewhere. There's just one catch to this all — it has to be your real name — the one your parents gave you.

Sounds pretty simple, eh? So, look, as soon as something you read irks at your heart strings, or any other place I'm not allowed to mention — just type (double-spaced, please) a nifty note under 50 lines to let us all know how you feel. Then just take it down to the campus basement and give it to us — you could even use campus mail if we scare you.

Problem of abandoned trays is easily solved

This letter is in reaction to the front page picture [Collegian, Sept. 29] titled "Tasty Morsels," where the UMass students are portrayed as being "too indolent to bus their own trays."

As the students who eat at Franklin Dining Commons know, this picture is very misleading.

Franklin has two sides in which students can drop off their trays. At lunch students usually have limited time in which to eat and get going to their next class.

For some strange reason, during peak lunch hours (11-1) only one side of this D.C. is open to drop off trays, which is annoying because after you find out which side is open (no signs of course) the line is very long and slow, something we are all used to at UMass.

The problem here is that there are two sides and using both of them would eliminate the problem of students leaving their trays on tables or on rolling racks as shown in the picture.

By using the facility as it was intended and closing down one side when it is slow would make a lot more sense.

I only wish the Collegian was there earlier to get a more realistic view of what was happening, that picture makes us look bad and is very misleading.

This paper has quite a large circulation and, as we know, it is important that we are careful how UMass students are perceived, especially by ourselves.

Nobel Prize winner Tutu to visit UMass

By MARTIN F. JONES
Collegian Staff

On Tuesday, Oct. 6 at 4:00 p.m., Archbishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa will address the University of Massachusetts at the Fine Arts Center. Desmond Tutu, 1984 Nobel Peace Prize recipient, will be discussing the present state of affairs in South Africa and the role he has played in the struggle against apartheid in South Africa. Tutu's visit at UMass will be the first stop of a national speaking tour. Proceeds from the event will go towards the Bishop Tutu Fund, which provides scholarships for Black South Africans to further their higher education.

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO
Archbishop Desmond Tutu.

Rev. Christopher Carlisle, Episcopal chaplain at the University who helped arrange Tutu's visit, hoped that a greater awareness could be raised towards the present situation in South Africa.

"We thought he would bring attention to the situation in South Africa while bringing into focus for Americans the state of race relations in their own country," said Rev. Carlisle. "It's through personal contact with bearers of hope such as Desmond Tutu that we can see the greater possibility for racial harmony and community."

Archbishop Tutu became an outspoken critic of apartheid at the age of 12. Graduating from Western High School in Johannesburg, he went on to study theology at St. Peter's Theological College in Johannesburg. In 1961, he was ordained to the priesthood and then went on to England for further studies, receiving a bachelor's degree in divinity and and a master's degree in theology in 1966 from Kings College in London.

In 1967, Archbishop Desmond Tutu returned to South Africa. In 1972, he became associate director of the Theological Education Fund, where he administered scholarship funds of the World Council of Churches. In 1974 he was installed as dean of Johannesburg and later was consecrated bishop of Lesotho the following year.

In 1978, Desmond Tutu became the first Black secretary general of the international South African Council of Churches. Under his leadership, the council became an important vehicle for Black leadership when the major African Nationalist groups were banned.

In 1984, Desmond Tutu spent a three month sabbatical at the General Theological Seminary in New York City. On Oct. 16 of that year, he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. Following his receipt of the Nobel Prize, Tutu returned to South Africa and advocated strong for the withdrawal of foreign interests and investments, leading the way for the implementation of economic sanctions on the government. Later in 1984, Desmond Tutu was consecrated Bishop of Johannesburg, the first Black South African to hold that title. Two years later he was enthroned as Anglican Archbishop of Cape Town and Metropolitan of the Church of the Province of Southern Africa.

Mzamo Mangaliso a professor in the School of Management who also helped arrange the visit, met Desmond Tutu while studying at Ft. Hare University in South Africa. After establishing some professional contacts there Mr. Mangaliso has initiated a drive to establish an exchange program between UMass and Ft. Hare University in South Africa.

"Black institutions in South Africa have been reaching out for support here in America," he said. "They are very excited about the response so far."

According to Mangaliso, several African-American professors have expressed interest in a special part of the exchange program in which professors from UMass could also participate in the program by taking a one-year sabbatical at Ft. Hare University.

Ft. Hare University is presently the bearer of the official archives of the African National Congress. The ANC, presently led by Nelson Mandela, is an 80-year-old Black South African political organization whose founders studied in the United States.

Mr. Mangaliso says the exchange program is "all part of a dream" that he has pursued for a number of years.

New Africa House to host cultural events

By MARTIN F. JONES
Collegian Staff

This Friday the New Africa House will play host to two events highlighting traditional African-American Culture. On Friday, Oct. 2, from 3 to 6 p.m., there will be a performance by the Lining Bar Gang. The group, mostly retired railroad workers, will perform behind the New Africa House where a temporary railroad track will be set up to provide an authentic setting for the performance.

The group of 16 men will recreate the call-and-response work songs of the Black railroad crews prior to mechanization. Originally, the railroad workers used the songs to synchronize their movements and lighten the heavy task of laying and maintaining the steel tracks. The Lining Bar Gang will also be performing from 10 to 11:30 a.m. at the Amherst Depot on Main St. in Amherst.

Appearing in conjunction with the Lining Bar Gang will be professional storyteller Dylan Pritchett, from Williamsburg, Pa. will be performing at the New Africa House in the Augusta Savage Art Gallery. Pritchett will be telling stories and singing songs drawing from Black Virginia historical tradition. Pritchett will also be interviewing members of the Lining Bar Gang for the public.

In addition to Friday's events, the Augusta Savage Memorial Art Gallery will be hosting a photo exhibit titled, "From North to South." The exhibit features 50 photographs, printed and Mounted by Cynthia Packard, a lecturer in the W.E.B. DuBois Dept. of Afro-American Studies. The exhibit documents the results of the early Black migration from the rural South to the urban North. Packard who also helped arrange the performance by the Lining Bar Gang and Dylan Pritchett, spent the the past four years doing research in Virginia to put together the exhibit.

Also to be displayed are are six sculptures by Dorrance Hill, assistant professor of Afro-American Studies. The pieces will celebrate the history of the south and particularly the Black Men who worked on the railroads. The exhibit will be running from September 28 to October 23.

The rise and fall of the Upward Bound program

For 25 years the Upward Bound program has been instrumental in helping minority students in establishing their college careers. This program has been crucial to our communities in recent years.

Penny
CAMERON

In 1988, 26,086.2 people enrolled in an institution of higher education, of that, 4,167.5 were minorities. In 1989 30,644 doctorate degrees were awarded, the percent of minorities that received these doctorates were, .12 percent Native American, 12.8 percent Asian, 13.2 percent Afro-American, 2.18 percent Hispanic, and 2.5 percent Puerto Rican.

With the statistics being what they are, to many the cry has been to make drastic changes in the current educational system. To the students and faculty that gathered in the New Africa House on Sept. 24, 1992, at 7 p.m., the cry was "why did a program that was created to change these statistics, had a 95 percent success rate, produced an astronaut on a current shuttle mission, and Jim Collins, who recently ran for state representative, get cancelled?"

In a meeting which consisted of representation from various multicultural organizations and most of their campus communities, the main issue was the cancellation of the Upward Bound program. The Upward Bound program was for promising, low income, high school students who would be the first generation of their families to go to college. The program lasted from freshman to senior year and consisted of financial aid advocacy, tutoring, counseling, and college preparatory classes. Upward Bound was housed on the University of Massachusetts, Amherst campus, employed a staff of seven, and serviced the Amherst, Holyoke, Pittsfield, and Springfield areas.

On May 8, 1992 the funding for the Upward Bound program was officially cut, after 25 years. The participants and employees of the program were notified on May 27. It is the issue of this 19 day delay that caused the most discontent throughout the meeting. Feelings began to run pretty high as former members of the program shared their remembrances in testimonial to the program's validity. This, in conjunction with back monies due the staff and statistics which came from 1982 used in the 1992 proposal made the participants feel that the cancellation of the Upward Bound program was premature.

The groups objectives for the meeting were to collect ideas on how to go about the reinstatement of the program, either in its full capacity or a down-scaled version of the program. University administration has implied the consideration of implementing another program to fill Upward Bound's absence, but any information on such a program has not been released. One person present at the meeting, who has asked not to be identified stated "Each year I go to more and more funerals or maternity wards or jails. The only reason for this I can see is that they have never been exposed to a different side of life, Upward Bound gave people this type of exposure. The program can't cost more than for a jail."

The next meeting concerning the Upward Bound program will be held on Oct. 1, 1992 in the New Africa House at 7 p.m.

Movies on HSCN this week: Ah-nold & Crystal

By MIKE GORNSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Hey there, oh faithful readers! This week, there are quite a few treats in store, including one of my favorite scenes in a movie – the orgasm scene in When Harry Met Sally. Also, for all you Ah-nold fans, he's back, he's good, and he's on HSCN in Terminator 2: Judgement Day. So keep it tuned religiously to Channel 7, and away we go with the movies that'll be shown from today 'til Tuesday (no pun intended.)

Dying Young — Julia Roberts, Campbell Scott. Well, looks like we're starting off on the wrong foot here, hmmm? Sigh, the previews looked so promising, didn't they? Too bad the movie didn't deliver. . . anything. It's your typical cancer movie with a little extra dramatic effect with the chemo scenes — very graphic. Julia is still irresistable but overacts a tad, Campbell is good looking and sweet, but MEGA thumbs down on the plot, and especially the cheesy ending. Survey says. . . BIG X! No stars.

Terminator 2: Judgement Day — Arnold Schwarzenegger, Robert Patrick, Linda Hamilton. Schwarzenegger's back, but this time he's the good guy, and he must protect Hamilton's son, John, who is being targeted for termination by the advanced evil cyborg played by Patrick. You won't get much dialogue from Patrick, but the special effects instilled upon his body will completely blow you away, especially when he gets slammed into a wall and reverses himself. Good lord, how on earth do they DO that? 1/2

Rocky Horror Picture Show — Tim Curry, Susan Sarandon, Barry Bostwick. Cult horror classic that always seems much better when you see it in Cambridge, but what the heck? A fine film anyway about a straight couple, Janet and Brad, who stumble onto a transvestite town of Transylvanian whackos. The music is unforgettable — let's do the time warp again.

Grease — John Travolta, Olivia Newton-John, Stockard Channing. Taken from the long-running Broadway show, Grease is lots of fun to watch. The choreography is simple yet magnetic, and the movie just oozes happiness in the 50s. A wop bop a loo bop a wop bam boom! 1/2

Big — Tom Hanks, Elizabeth Perkins, Robert Loggia. Clearly the most delightfully innocent movie I have ever seen. Hanks is a 13-year-old boy who wishes he were big and gets his wish as he turns into a 30-year-old the very next morning! Hanks is simply adorable, and the directing by Penny Marshall is superb. ****

Project X — Matthew Broderick, Helen Hunt, Bill Sadler. Very enjoyable story with a Disney-like ending about a military pilot wishful who is assigned to teach chimps how to fly simulated planes. Broderick discovers a dark secret, however, and is enraged when he realizes that the chimps are being subjected to more than just flying lessons. The chimps are a delight to watch. ***

Regarding Henry — Harrison Ford, Annette Bening. Ford is a man obsessed with his career who finds little time or patience for his family but is engaged in an affair when he gets shot in the chest and in the head during a convenience store robbery. He loses his memory and must relearn how to read, write, etc., and he turns into a really nice guy. A film that grabs the heart and doesn't let go. ***

Air America — Mel Gibson, Robert Downey Jr., Nancy Travis. I personally think that the producers tried to get a couple of major studs on a high budget and a script writer on a low budget. Help! A couple of CIA guys run some smuggling operation. It's part action/adventure, part comedy, and mostly stupid and a waste of good talent. Sigh. A couple of chuckles save it, but not by much. *1/2

Madonna: Truth or Dare — Madonna is so independent and rebellious, you just have to respect her mannerisms. The movies is autobiographical, and really interesting — an insider's guide into the mind of Madonna. Sure, the water bottle scene is what you will always hear about, but it goes much farther than that. Trust me! Don't miss it. She's electric. ***

Micki and Maude — Dudley Moore, Amy Irving, Ann Reinking. I suppose my loathing for Dudley Moore as an actor has something to do with my incredible distaste for this tedious and overworked farce, but I think that the plot may have had a thing or two to do with it also. Moore has a wife and a girlfriend who are both pregnant with his child, and go into labor at the same time. Some funny scenes in the hospital, but not a lot more to it. *1/2

A Nightmare of Elm Street — John Saxon, Heather Langenkamp, Johnny Depp. Classic horror film of our generation, I must say! Made Freddie Krueger a household name. . . director Wes Craven is very creative in this movie about a bunch of teenagers who are terrorized by their nightmares that eventually tie into reality as they are murdered one by one. This is definitely a nightmare-producing flick! ***

The Natural — Robert Redford, Robert Duvall, Glenn Close. A superstar cast is packed into this movie about a baseball player who leads a very interesting and depressing life. He plays 'til he's past his prime, but that doesn't matter, cause you have to play by the rules in movies, people! You just can't end on a sour note. If it's a baseball movie, it has to end with some guy hitting a homer into some lights or something cliche like that. **

When Harry Met Sally — Billy Crystal, Meg Ryan, Carrie Fisher, Bruno Kirby. Yep, my favorite orgasm scene! Fantastic movie about a couple who meet in college and hate each other, meet again in an airport and really don't care for each other, and then meet again in New York and become friends and eventually a couple. It's down to earth, funny, sad and very realistic. It's a heartwarmer, a tearjerker, a comedy. It's just fantastic all around! ****

Welcome Home — Kris Kristofferson, JoBeth Williams, Sam Waterson. Tired film about an MIA who comes home to his wife and son after 17 years. Yeah, nice! How 'bout a shock, there? "Hi honey, I'm home. Yeah, it's nearly two decades later, and I've got a new Cambodian wife and a kid, but I'd really like to get back together with you. You were faithful, right?" Yah, suuuuure!*

Movies that are on HSCN this week but are not reviewed are: City of Joy, Miracle Mile, Panic in Needle Park, Planet of the Apes, Runaway, This is My Life, Thunderheart, and Young Visitors.

By ERIC T. NELSON
Collegian Correspondent

"On a sunny day, you would see the people on the streets looking down at the ground, hunched up in their big overcoats," is how michael Brendon MacInnis describes his time spent in what once was the German Democratic Republic, commonly known as East Germany. MacInnis's exhibit of black and white photographs of the GDR is now showing in the Student Union Art Gallery

Severe images of a country beaten into submission under a communist rule greet the onlooker walking into the exhibit. It is comprised of five years worth of photographs taken while travelling and experiencing life in the GDR. The pictures tell the story of a country that was afraid to.

Michael Brendon MacInnis is 33 years old. He grew up in the Allston and Newton areas of Boston and then moved to California at the age of 21. After studying sculpting and filmmaking at the Massachussetts College of Art, he transferred to the University of Massachussetts at Boston to study German and French Literature.

MacInnis moved to the Federal Republic of Germany, or West Germany, in 1986 to participate in the UMass Freiburg/Baden - Wurttemburg program and proceeded to study at the University of Freiburg. He completed bachelor's degrees in both French and German while there and proceeded to go on to graduate studies until leaving in 1991

During this time, he travelled extensively in eastern Germany, doing most of his photo work between the years 1987-1989. A large portion of the work comes from the city of East Berlin, which he is most familiar with, but other large cities such as Dresden and Bittefeld are

Too Much Joy: Too Cool

By ERIC SAULNIER and CUTTER GARCIA
Collegian Staff

Loose, ringing harmonies cutting over crunching guitar-work was one of the reasons we first picked up the Clash. What do we listen to now while still avoiding the Jones and Strummer wannabees? TOO MUCH JOY!

Mutiny, the foursome's fourth album and second major label release (on Warner Brothers GIANT division) is the finest collection of songs from TMJ since their second album, Son of Sam I Am.

Too Much Joy's unique vocal approach shines through on this release. Harmonies which most bands might mix and lose behind the leads', rise up to meld with lead singer Tim Quirk's witty vocal lines.

Producer William Whittman (Cyndi Lauper, The Outfield, Graham Parker) crosses over nicely to work with the Joy boys in producing an album which grabs you by the ears and forces you to tap your feet while appreciating the way that TMJ looks at life.

The lead single "Donna Everywhere" (whose video can be seen on MTV's 120 MINUTES but DESERVES to be a BUZZ CLIP) keeps you dancing while telling the tale of a chance encounter with a beautiful woman and the burning effect she has on Quirk's memory.

Starry Eyes is a great cover tune re-worked lyrically to create an extremely singable tune about issues like censorship, abuse of authority, conservative regulations and early closing bars.

Chili Pepper fans beware — "Just Like a Man" packs everything a Flea jam can hold plus a really hooky chorus. And if Bass is your thing, TMJ's Sandy Smallens proves to be one of the tastiest players around.

These guys touch every genre of Pop music to create their own sub-grouping and the sound that they produce is so distinctive that it is a joy to listen to the tunes again and again.

So why haven't you heard of these guys? Because they're not from Seattle! They're from Scarsdale, N.Y. spoiled, white suburbia. But that's o.k. because Too Much Joy doesn't take themselves too seriously and that's their charm. "One day we're going to be pompous assholes," quips Tim Quirk. "We just want that day to be as far off as possible."

So if the rest of the music world wakes up when the "Seattle Buzz" is gone, maybe then they'll give Too Much Joy a listen. Until they do - do yourself a favor and buy their latest release Mutiny and any of their past availables. If you buy only one new CD or tape this year it should be Mutiny, you owe it to yourself.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Taking things nice and slow could strengthen a promising relationship. The two of you move forward together on a better basis. Travel and economic changes overseas stimulate business.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Stay on your toes at work — great plans are being hatched behind closed doors! A night out may not suit your mood this evening. Apologize for backing out at the last minute.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Seek professional help if you are disturbed about something. Completing a special project on time could win you a bonus or promotion. A telephone call shows you a shortcut to financial success.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Keep closer tabs on your expenses when traveling. Put receipts in a safe place in case questions arise. A better understanding of tax laws helps you increase your savings.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Someone who holds you in high regard wants to reward you. Learn to accept praise and gifts graciously. Do what you can to open up new worlds to a child who is reaching out.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Be tactful but honest when asked for your opinion. Pretending to approve of an idea or an individual could come back to haunt you.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Long-distance travel may not be as satisfying as you hoped. Extra time and energy can turn a loss into a long winning streak. A money situation will soon shift in your favor.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A difference of opinion regarding money could leave you and a loved one on the outs. Postpone starting new collaborative ventures. Instead, complete projects begun last week.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A very fortunate romantic encounter could greatly improve your whole outlook. Happy expectations have you walking on air! Go on an artistic or literary binge.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A convivial meeting could prove profitable for everyone concerned. Something new is added to the job scene, spurring you on. A sauna, hot bath or massage is especially relaxing this evening.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Yesterday's efforts pay off nicely. Greater efficiency increase your chances for a raise. To avoid mental exhaustion, leave any work worries at the office.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 21): Alliances of all types are under stress now. Avoid making new demands or rocking the boat. A public relations campaign is worth the time and effort.

included. MacInnis stresses the fact that the impact of the exhibit comes from it being shot in the perspective of an outsider looking in.

Many of the people in the photos are people with whom MacInnis formed relationships during his time there. This is evident through the intimate settings in some of the photographs in the exhibit, showing the degree of trust given to him by his friends and subjects.

In conjunction with the exhibit, there are works by three East German authors presented. They are deliberately located somewhat removed from the photographs in an effort to force the onlooker to seek them out, and to understand their meaning in relation to the rest of the exhibit. The pieces showcase the work of Elisabeth Alexander, Elfriede Bruening, and Ruth B., all chosen for their anonymity. The fact that they have no known identity is allegorical to the rest of the faceless residents of this nation.

The enthusiasm, naivete and innocence that were the trademarks of citizens of the GDR is something that MacInnis says he missed in today's reunited Germany. This point is reinforced by an anecdote he tells of East Berlin. Two children found a wallet, and the first thing they said to each other was, "who do I bring it to?" They asked an old woman sitting on a bench and she told them to take it to a policeman, which they zealously ran away to do. This is one of the positive things instilled into the people by their government - always do the right thing and follow the rules.

MacInnis said this reminded him of a scene that could have been plucked out of Anytown, U.S.A. in the 1930s but which sadly would probably not happen in our country today. This genuine enthusiasm and no doubt about what is right is what MacInnis says is lacking in Germany today, now that the eastern half is no longer under the protective net of a socialist government.

"The exhibit is intended to put a human face on the GDR, to point out to people that it really existed and was a society that represented two generations," said MacInnis, "it is a comment that the true GDR was not a nation of hostile peoples, which is how they are now being portrayed."

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

IF YOU THOUGHT COLLEGE WAS EXPENSIVE, TRY PUTTING YOURSELF THROUGH RETIREMENT.

Think about supporting yourself for twenty-five, thirty years or longer in retirement. It might be the greatest financial test you'll ever face. Fortunately, you have one valuable asset in your favor. Time.

Time to take advantage of tax-deferral. Time for your money to grow.

But starting early is key. Consider this: if you begin saving just $100 a month at age thirty, you can accumulate $192,539* by the time you reach age sixty-five. Wait ten years and you'd need to set aside $227 a month to reach the same goal.

At TIAA-CREF, we not only understand the value of starting early, we can help make it possible—with flexible retirement and tax-deferred annuity plans, a diverse portfolio of investment choices, and a record of personal service that spans 75 years.

Over a million people in education and research are already enrolled in America's largest retirement system. Find out how easy it is to join them. Call today and learn how simple it is to put yourself through retirement when you have time and TIAA-CREF on your side.

Start planning your future. Call our Enrollment Hotline 1 800 842-2888.

lessly blindsided Sabres goalie Darren Puppa as time expired. Both benches predictably emptied and the fans predictably roared with approval as two arch-rivals went toe-to-toe on the ice.

Folks, this was only an exhibition game. It was for practice. It didn't count. But that didn't stop either team, now, did it? That's just because "gosh I really hate your guts" rivalries are par for the course in the Adams, hockey's toughest division.

The battle for the division lead will boil down to the Montreal Canadiens and the Boston Bruins — a team who wore black before it was cool.

It's hard to say if the Bruins can once more overtake the Habs, considering the B's have a new coach in Brian Sutter and are without Cam Neely once more (up yours, Ulf Samuelson). But because the Bruins are the NHL's version of James Brown — the hardest-working team in hockey — it's difficult, if not impossible, to bet against them.

As for Les Habitants? Being swept by the Bruins really had to smart in Montreal. So you've got to figure they'll be just as competitive as last year, and what's more there'll be plenty of motivation to oust the Bruins, who have suddenly turned the tables in their storied rivalry by owning them in the playoffs.

The rest? Now that the expansion Ottawa Senators have taken Quebec's place as the worst team in the Adams, the pressure's off the Nordiques. In addition, the Nords picked up a bunch of talented players in the Eric Lindros deal. Considering all those young players on their roster you've got to wonder if this is the year the Nords make it back to the NHL sweet 16.

Buffalo? Go figure. They could finish first or fourth and few would be surprised by either. The Sabres are a team with Stanley Cup talent and Red Sox playoff luck, destined to choke in big games.

As for the rest of the league? Who cares? Well, maybe you do so here's a quick glance at those other, lesser divisions.

Patrick: Even though Pittsburgh won the Cup, the New York Rangers are still the pick of the litter. Last year's playoff lapse will otherwise haunt this team unless they win the whole thing. Don't bet against it.

Pittsburgh, Washington and New Jersey should all perform well, with only the Penguins challenging the Rangers' dominance. Philly will surprise, but only if Lindros proves he's worth the obscene amount of capital the Flyers spent to land and sign him.

Norris: The only given here is Tampa Bay will not make the playoffs. Otherwise, Lightning fans can forget the final score and count Manon Rheaume's save total, if she becomes the first woman in the NHL. They should let her - there'll be few other thrills for this team.

Chicago and Detroit look like the early favorites in the Norris, with St. Louis and Minnesota close behind and Toronto a lot further back. The Maple Laughs have got to be thanking their lucky stars that an expansion team landed in their division.

Smythe: Wayne Gretzky is out, maybe for keeps. Now we find out how good the Los Angeles Kings really are, and I'll venture a guess the answer is "not very." They could fall as low as fourth. Calgary will be back as a result, but in hot pursuit of Edmonton, Winnipeg (maybe) and Vancouver.

See you at the TOC when Lindros makes his NHL debut. . .

YanCon

The Rams were embarrassed this past weekend by perennial YanCon doormat Richmond, who could be the surprise team of the Yankee Conference.

Jim Marshall's Spiders have compiled a 2-1 (1-1 YanCon) record while posting impressive victories over URI (46-14) and James Madison (49-40), ranked as high as 18th in preseason Division-1AA polls.

In other YanCon action from this past weekend, the University of New Hampshire, led by YanCon offensive-player-of-the-week Jim Stayer, downed Dartmouth 45-27 with their 21 point fourth quarter outburst in Durham, NH.

Down in Blue Hen country, Delaware head coach Earl "Tubby" Raymond is seeing red, after Saturday's 21-20 loss to Division 2 Westchester, Penn. Looks like Blue Hen QB Bill Vergantino's dream of a perfect season was just that, a dream.

freshman year.

And this year? This year she has led the Minutewomen to an 8-0 start by allowing only 2 goals (one widely disputed vs. Boston College) and collecting six shutouts. Scott's lightning-fast reflexes extend off the field as the senior is quick to credit her defense for her vast success.

"This year I get a lot of credit for not allowing goals, but the defense in front of me has prevented me from facing many shots," Scott said.

So for someone who at one time wasn't even thinking about continuing her career in field hockey, her last year won't be filled with high expectations, right? Wrong.

"Obviously our goal every year is to make the NCAAs, but we don't want to look too far ahead," Scott said. "This is the last year that I have a chance to win, and if we're ever going to do it, it's gotta be this year."

Athlete of the Week: Philippa Scott

COURTESY SPORTS INFORMATION
Goalie Philippa Scott is the Collegian Athlete of the Week. Scott, a senior from Corsham, England is finishing up a BDIC major focusing on adolescent development and education.

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Things could've worked out far differently. University of Massachusetts field hockey goalie Philippa Scott could have easily been working in Corsham, England today instead of starting in goal on Totman Field against Northeastern University at 3:30 p.m. She might have easily been a midfielder, because she wasn't discovered as a goalie until age 17.

Even worse, she could be playing for Temple.

Scott has been named the Collegian's Athlete of the Week for her performance last week. She went 3-0 and registered two shutouts in games against Stanford University, Rutgers University and Temple. Scott has helped the Minutwomen stay at No. 5 in the NCAA poll for two weeks in a row.

Scott, who brings a minuscule 0.046 goals-against average into the matchup, didn't even consider Massachusetts when she was growing up across the Atlantic Ocean. In fact, she didn't even enter a university right out of high school and had begun to look around for a job.

"I worked for a year after I left school, but I wasn't content," she said. "I worked at a summer school in the States and everyone was talking about U.S. universities and how they offered scholarships, so I decided to get back into education."

Scott grew up playing field hockey since age 11, but said she wasn't moved to goalie until she was 17, and had a chance to play for an all-district mixed team.

She rose quickly as a goalkeeper, making the England under-21 team one year later. Thanks to a national field hockey scouting agency, UMass head coach Pam Hixon got Scott's profile and, sight unseen, got her to come to Amherst.

"I had never seen her in person, but when I was recruiting her we talked back and forth on the phone," Hixon said. "I looked at a videotape I received on her from an international recruiting agency, but I didn't see too much. I was recruiting two goalies from Massachusetts, but neither one of them ended up coming here."

Scott's first choice was Atlantic 10 archrival Temple but things didn't work out and, "[Hixon] just grabbed me."

You might say it was a stroke of luck for all parties involved. Scott has played nearly every game since her

Northeastern (5-1) vs. Massachusetts (8-0)
Today, 3:30 p.m., Totman Field

Today's game gives the Minutewomen first crack at avenging two heartwrenching losses at the hands of the Huskies. Last year's regular season matchup was played in similar circumstances.

Like this year, Massachusetts was 8-0 heading into the Northeastern game and the Minutewomen were scheduled to play the number one team in the country, Old Dominion that weekend. Northeastern controlled the overconfident UMass squad and squeeked out a 1-0 victory, breaking the team's winning streak.

"The only thing similar for us going into the this game is our record," UMass goalie Philippa Scott said. "We're a totally different team this year and there's no way we're looking ahead."

In the first round of the 1991 NCAA Tournament, Northeastern defeated the Minutewomen again, this time by a 2-1 score in double OT.

UMass is currently fifth in the nation while Northeastern is ranked No. 7.

So, coach Hixon, any chance UMass will be looking past the Huskies again?

"Not on your life."

Minutemen back home

Men's soccer hosts Providence today

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

Non-conference games are used by teams to toughen up their schedules and prepare them for the stretch drives.

That is what the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team hopes will happen on Wednesday when the Minutemen host the Providence Friars at Garber Field at 2:00 p.m.

UMass (5-1-1) will be returning home after a three game road swing which brought them one victory (URI), one loss (Dartmouth) and one big tie (Rutgers).

The Rutgers game was significant to the Minutemen because the Scarlet Knights are the two-time defending Atlantic 10 champ and possible foe in postseason play. The tie with Rutgers put UMass in great position to clinch a berth in the A-10 tournament.

Now The Minutemen must focus on the Friars (3-2-1). Providence has won two in a row via shutout, so the Friars are a team to be reckoned with.

Offensively, Providence is led by sophomore forward Matt Baldwin, freshman Brian Jones, and senior co-captain Brian Anselmo. Baldwin leads the team with three goals and eight points while Jones and Anselmo have five and four points respectively.

In goal the Friars use the tandem of junior James Smith and senior Rob Falaguerra. Smith is 2-1 with just one goal allowed while Falaguerra is 1-1-1 with five goals allowed. Expect to see Smith in net against UMass after he posted a shutout over Georgetown his last time out.

For UMass, their strength all season has been solid team play overall. Juniors Justin Edelman and Randy Jacobs lead the Minuteman offense. Edelman has 11 points and Jacobs has 10 points. However, UMass's offense is balanced with six players having at least five points.

Defensively, the Minutemen have been solid all year with five games of one goal or less being allowed. A big question for the Minutemen will be whether sophomore goalie Mark Wolf will be able to return from a painful hip pointer he suffered during a practice last week. Erick Gruber stepped in against Rutgers last week and performed admirably in the 2-2 tie.

Game Notes: UMass will be putting its home unbeaten streak on the line against the Friars. The Minutemen are 4-0 at Garber Field. The UMass-Northeastern University game originally slated for October 6th at Northeastern has been changed to October 5th at Ludlow at 7:00 p.m.

Women face Dartmouth

No. 5 soccer look to avoid letdown

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team, fresh off its new No. 5 national ranking, will face a Dartmouth squad (today, 4 p.m. on Garber Field) which has given them fits the past two seasons.

In 1990 Dartmouth defeated the Minutewomen 1-0, despite only taking two shots in the game. Last season, the Big Green again played a defensive style and held the game scoreless until Massachusetts' Polly Hackathorn scored the game winner in overtime.

"They have played us tough the last two years," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "The defensive style was difficult for us. We could not score a traditional style goal against them."

In the past two meetings, Dartmouth routinely sacrificed its offense by keeping 10 players back on defense, effectively clogging all passing lanes and opportunities for UMass's runs. Offensively, the Green waited for a breakout or a Minutewomen mistake to pounce on.

"The bunker D is tough to handle if you get frustrated," Rudy said. "If they play that style, and I am not positive that they will, we will have to stay focused."

Dartmouth (3-2) coach Steve Swanson would not divulge his team's game plan but his team does boast of some speedy front people in the likes of freshman Kate Andrews and sophomore Mya Mangawang, who have opened the Dartmouth attack up this season. The Green scored six goals against Pennsylvania earlier in the season.

"Their speed up front is tremendous," Rudy said. "They may be the fastest front team we play this season. They can score this year."

Massachusetts (7-0) jumped from No. 10 to No. 5 nationally this week and moved up one spot to second in the region leaving only Connecticut (No. 3 nationally) ahead of them. North Carolina remained No. 1 in the country for the fourth consecutive week. The Minutewomen will have to guard against a let down when they play the unranked Green.

"I do not think we will have a drop off in our intensity," Rudy said. "We worked so hard to get to [No. 5] we will work hard to keep it. We have something to play for now, we want to keep this high ranking."

Swanson said, "We are not concerned with the rankings. I didn't need a poll to tell me how good UMass was. They are extremely athletic, they have skilled players, they move the ball well and they've got good leaders. That is a tough formula to beat.

"With UMass you can't just beat two players, you have to beat the whole team," Swanson said. "It starts with the goalie on up because they play so well as a unit."

Yankee Conference notebook

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

Week three of the 1992 University of Massachusetts football season is in the books, and what a week it was.

On Saturday, Mike Hodges's Minutemen christened a brand new season at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium with a 30-28 win over Yankee Conference foe Boston University, as Rene Ingoglia rushed for 148 yards in his first collegiate start.

YANKEE CONFERENCE

Ingoglia's performance on Saturday earned him Yankee Conference rookie-of-the-week honors, while UMass's Phil Lartigue took home defensive-player-of-the-week honors for his fifteen tackles and one fumble recovery against the Terriers.

"It's a great honor for Phil," Hodges said. "There's a lot of great defensive players in the Yankee Conference, and he just played an outstanding game."

Lartigue leads the YanCon in tackles with 45, while Lartigues Minutemen teammates Don Caparotti and Matt Rajotte are tied for third in interceptions with two.

Perry watch: UMass linebacker Mario Perry had six tackles on Saturday, sacking BU quarterback Walter Norton Jr. once. Perry is playing like a man possessed, and remains a constant threat whenever the opposition has the ball.

It appears for now that the Minutemen have remained relatively injury free through the first three games. Junior tailback John Johnson was sidelined last week with turf toe, but is expected to see action next week.

Also on the injury front, UMass inside linebacker Bobby Burke should return against Rhode Island, enabling Scott Assencoa to move back to outside linebacker.

The Minutemen have moved up to number eight in this week's Lambert-Meadowlands poll for the best Div. 1-AA team in the East, while YanCon favorite Villanova sits atop the poll.

UMass has no game this week, and resumes its YanCon schedule when they travel to South Kingston, RI to take on the University of Rhode Island on October 10th.

Adams Div. tops NHL this season

UM athletes encouraged by sports equality ruling

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

A recent court ruling at Colgate University granting equal opportunity for female students to play ice hockey at the intercollegiate varsity level is sending a message to former University of Massachusetts women varsity tennis players — and they're hearing it loud and clear.

Women who are currently fighting, with the help of a lawyer, to have the women's tennis and lacrosse teams restored feel the decision could have far-reaching ramifications in intercollegiate sports here at the University as well as across the country.

"The decision is huge," said Edwin Gentzler, the former women's tennis coach. "It's a landmark decision."

The team's main argument is based on a statute which calls for equal participation and funding between men and women — Title IX of the federal Education Amendments.

"I'm definitely in favor of the decision and happy to see that women are being represented," said the former tennis co-captain Amy Ryan, a senior communication disorders major.

Since 1989, the women's tennis, lacrosse and volleyball teams have been eliminated. Currently, the University has 13 men's varsity sports and 10 women's sports.

Title IX, providing equal benefits and opportunities for women, was enforced in the Colgate case Monday by US Magistrate Judge David N. Hurd in Utica, N.Y. According to a Boston Globe reporter, Hurd stated that the liberal arts college in Hamilton, N.Y. was obligated under federal anti-discrimination law to turn the women's hockey club team into a varsity team, since there is a men's varsity hockey team.

Ryan said she thinks the decision will probably be influential to the teams' struggle here at the University.

"It's a big thing right now. It helps a lot, especially if you have a strong team," Ryan said. "Women should be able to be represented at the varsity level."

Gentzler said it is easy for any university administration to demonstrate that there is not a lot of interest in hockey on the part of women.

"For a judge to rule equal opportunity — that's really big," said Gentzler. "It's a major decision."

Gentzler also said he thought the decision was so "big" because it involved equal allocation of practice time, use of facilities and number of teams.

Former tennis team member Carrie Kaminski, a senior elementary education major, also said she thinks the decision will influence the fight she is involved in with the University for the team.

"I do think it helps us," Kaminski said. "It shows that other universities are dealing with equality issues."

"It seems universities are taking time to make things equal. At least they are realizing there are problems," Kaminski added.

The tennis team's other co-captain, junior Pam Levine, said she is glad to see colleges taking women into consideration in "what's been a problem for so long."

"It puts pressure on the athletic department to see if we're in compliance with Title IX," said Levine.

Since a Washington State precedent in 1987 that also ruled greater opportunity, Gentler said women students who have challenged their school have won.

"If [a school] spends money on men's teams, women should be raising questions," said Gentzler.

UMass Athletic Director Glenn Wong is taking a hard look at the decision.

"Before the decision, Title IX gave institutions flex-

Nightly police sweeps affecting bar business

By KELLY GEERS
Collegian Correspondent

Amherst police are stirring up controversy among bar owners and their patrons by conducting nightly sweeps in area bars, according to local students and businessmen.

The sweeps have police randomly checking ID's and enforcing the bars' recently-enacted capacity limits.

This is not a full-fledged sweep," said Lt. Jeffrey Roy of the Amherst police department. "[Amherst Chief Donald Maia] ordered a foot patrol from 4 p.m. to 3 a.m. for downtown, starting in September."

The policy was initiated due to local residents' complaints about noise after 1 a.m. when the bars close, and in response to alcohol-related problems.

In the past, these police sweeps were only done on Thursday, Friday and Saturdays. "The police officers' duty is to watch local establishments," said Roy.

"I don't have actual numbers," he said, "but I estimate we have arrested six to seven [underaged drinkers] so far. Bar owners have been complying favorably."

Leaving Liquors 44 Friday evening, Rich Lombardi, 23, of Quincy was in Amherst visting his girlfriend, a UMass sophomore.

"I can appreciate what the cops are trying to do, but it seems like too much. I live near Boston and I never had to deal with this before," Lombardi said.

Mark Forsythe, owner of Twister's Tavern, believes that "partrons are quite dismayed" with the nightly checks.

As a result, Forsythe believes more and more of his patrons may be choosing other options instead of the bar scene.

"I've heard from staff that people are now opting for [off-campus] parties," said Forsythe. "The lines are getting to be too long because of the capacity limits and people are afraid of the police."

But Forsythe believes the nightly police checks won't curb illegal drinking habits.

"Police are being a little overzealous. This lightens the problem but we will never stop underaged drinking," he said.

"I don't mind the sweeps," says Forsythe, adding, "no one has been caught in Twister's so far."

Although things are busier than ever, Forsythe said he believes that these issues, "may eventually effect business."

"This is the wrong message to be sending to the students," he said. "It's saying just come here to study but don't socialize. That's wrong."

Other local bar managers agree. According to Jerry Jolly, manager of the Pub and Rafters, police are conducting sweeps every single night, randomly checking the ID's of about 30 percent of the crowd.

"Nightly sweeps aren't neccesary," says Jolly. "If they ride by they'll know. We have trained doormen, and we are making a conscious effort to comply. We go to the Amherst police training courses."

Jolly adds, "Bar owners in Amherst have a very good attitude regarding the issues."

Local bar owners say that the nightly checks are also an enforcement of the capacity limits.

Starting in January, the Town of Amherst and bar owners have been back and forth over the limits.

Twister's Forsythe believes "the capacity limits are unrealistic. We have consulted a contracter who says if we move out the tables and chairs at night, we can accommodate 79 more customers safely."

The dilemmas for students are only beginning. The long lines of students waiting to gain access to popular nightspots and police presence are making many weary.

A small group stood outside the Subway last Friday night weighing their options. A UMass junior from Westboro who asked not to be identified said, "I don't want to get hassled. I just want to have fun."

Students look to Somalia

Committee addresses famine problem

By EMILY GOLD
Collegian Correspondant

Though Somalia's severe famine is located on the other side of the world, a group of students in the Five College community are attempting to increase awareness of the famine by supporting movements to bring in food and reconstruct the nation.

The "Help Somalia Committee," which was formed in August by graduate students Hassan Mohamed and Tim Mitchell, encourages students to publicize the issue, write letters to the United Nations and the U.S. government and make donations to organizations aiding Somalia.

"When we first came together, [our goal was] to raise awareness about the problem in Somalia [and] encourage the international community to intervene," says Mohamed.

According to Mohamed, the crisis is due to a series of three civil wars in Somalia. In January, 1991, rebel factions began the first war by overthrowing military dictators.

However, these factions were unable to form a unified government, causing a second war between the rebel groups. In Nov. 1991, a disagreement between Somalia's entering civilian president and his military chief of staff led to a war between members of the same faction, ended by the United Nations.

NE passes test on toxics

By JOHN DIAMOND
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The New England states are relatively free of toxic pollution, a non-profit watchdog group reported Wednesday.

None of the six New England states were in the top half of the nation in total pounds of toxics released in 1990, according to a compilation of data by the group Public Citizen.

Massachusetts ranked 32nd with 41 million pounds of toxic air and water pollution in 1990; Connecticut was 33rd with 35 million pounds; Maine was 40th with 17 million pounds; New Hampshire was 45th with 10 million pounds; Rhode Island was 46th with 8.3 million pounds; and Vermont was the cleanest state in the nation in terms of toxic releases with 1.3 million pounds. Texas led the nation with 536 million pounds of toxics released into the environment.

Even if all six New England states were combined, there were still 14 other states with higher total toxic emissions. The petroleum producing and processing states of Texas, Louisiana and New Jersey and centers of heavy industry such as Pennsylvania, Illinois, Michigan and Ohio were the top toxic polluters.

The inventory does not include emissions from utilities, vehicles, small business and homes — pollution sources that would no doubt move the crowded northeastern states higher on the toxics list.

In virtually all cases, the toxic pollution reported falls within the legally allowed limits. Sources of toxic pollution in New England are paper companies, printing presses, tile coating firms, chemical companies and manufacturers.

"What the (state) law does today is attempt to set a standard for those living near a particular facility," said Dan Greenbaum, commissioner of the Massachusetts Department of Environmental Protection. "What we have recognized is
